Haligric Research Integration Series

Pranic Healing

A COMPLETE DEEP DIVE

The No-Touch Energy Healing System of Grand Master Choa Kok Sui

---

Somewhere between the clinic and the meditation hall, a Filipino-Chinese businessman built a system out of a question he could not let go of: if the body carries a field of life energy, can that field be read, cleaned, and restored by trained hands that never touch the skin?

Grand Master Choa Kok Sui spent decades testing that question against thousands of cases, then wrote it down as a teachable method — scan, sweep, energize — so that anyone willing to practice could learn to feel what he felt.

What follows is the full architecture of that method: its origins, its techniques, its institutions, and the case both for and against it, laid out plainly for a reader who has never heard the word prana before.

Contents

Introduction — What Is Pranic Healing....3
Origins — Grand Master Choa Kok Sui and the Birth of a System....3
Key Figures and Foundational Texts....4
Theology and Belief — Prana, the Aura, and the Chakras....4
The Eleven Major Chakras....5
Color Pranas and the Language of Energy....5
A Basic Pranic Healing Session — Step by Step....5
The Meditation on Twin Hearts....6
Self-Care and Daily Practice....7
Institutions, Training, and Certification....7
Legacy, Global Spread, and Philanthropy....8
Controversies and a Fair Accounting....8
Closing Statement....9

Introduction — What Is Pranic Healing

Pranic Healing is a system of energy healing developed by the Filipino-Chinese businessman and spiritual teacher Grand Master Choa Kok Sui (1952-2007). It is built on the premise that a subtle life force — called prana in Sanskrit, chi in Chinese, and ki in Japanese — surrounds and interpenetrates the physical body as an energy field, or aura. Practitioners are trained to scan this field with their hands without touching the skin, identify areas of depleted or congested energy, remove the diseased energy through a process called "sweeping," and then project fresh energy into the area to accelerate the body's own healing response.

The system positions itself explicitly as a complement to, not a replacement for, orthodox medicine. Its promotional and training materials consistently instruct practitioners to refer serious or unclear conditions to a physician, and Pranic Healing centers frequently describe their work as "adjuvant" or supportive care alongside conventional treatment. It is taught through a structured, tiered curriculum — Basic Pranic Healing, Advanced Pranic Healing, Pranic Psychotherapy, and Arhatic Yoga among the core levels — delivered through Choa Kok Sui's own books, certified instructors, and a global network of foundations and study centers that continue to operate under his name nearly two decades after his death.

Origins — Grand Master Choa Kok Sui and the Birth of a System

Choa Kok Sui was born in 1952 in the Philippines to a Chinese-Filipino family and trained first as a chemical engineer and successful businessman before turning his attention full-time to esoteric and occult studies. Practitioner biographies describe a period of intensive personal research in which he studied a range of Eastern and Western esoteric traditions — including material associated with the Theosophical Society, yogic and Taoist energy practices, and Christian mysticism — while experimenting on himself and volunteers to test which energy-healing techniques produced consistent, repeatable, and teachable results.

The distinguishing feature of his approach, as told in Pranic Healing organizational histories, was his insistence on codification: rather than presenting healing as an inborn gift limited to a few gifted individuals, he broke the process into a defined sequence of steps — scanning, sweeping, and energizing — that he believed an ordinary person could learn in a structured course, in the same way one might learn a martial art or a musical instrument. He formally introduced the system to the public in the Philippines in the 1980s, publishing his first book, Pranic Healing, in 1987 through Samahang Pranic Healing Foundation of the Philippines (later reissued internationally). The book quickly became the foundation-level manual still used in Basic Pranic Healing courses worldwide.

Choa Kok Sui died in Manila on March 19, 2007. Leadership of the various Pranic Healing organizations he founded passed to a network of senior teachers and family members, and the movement fragmented somewhat organizationally in the years after his death — different national foundations, the World Pranic Healing Foundation, and affiliated "GMCKS" (Grand Master Choa Kok Sui) branded centers now operate with a degree of independence from one another, though all trace their teaching lineage and core curriculum directly back to his original texts.

Key Figures and Foundational Texts

Grand Master Choa Kok Sui remains the system's sole originating figure; unlike some energy-healing traditions, Pranic Healing does not claim a long unbroken lineage of prior masters, though Choa Kok Sui himself credited esoteric philosophy, yoga, and Theosophical writings (including the work of authors such as C.W. Leadbeater on the aura and chakras) as intellectual influences on his synthesis.

His core published texts, still used as the backbone of the certification curriculum, include:

- Pranic Healing (1987) — the foundational manual covering the basic theory of prana, the aura, and the scan-sweep-energize technique.
- Advanced Pranic Healing: Practical Handbook for Healing with Color Energies — introduces color-coded pranas and more advanced energetic protocols for specific ailments.
- Pranic Psychotherapy — applies the same energy-based framework to emotional and psychological conditions, describing techniques for cleansing negative emotional "thoughtforms" from the aura.
- Miracles Through Pranic Healing — a widely circulated practical manual and case-study compendium aimed at both practitioners and general readers.
- Additional titles on Arhatic Yoga, Pranic Crystal Healing, Pranic Feng Shui, and Kabbalistic and esoteric topics, reflecting the broader spiritual system Choa Kok Sui built around the core healing technique.

Since his death, senior disciples and certified Master Teachers — organized through bodies such as the World Pranic Healing Foundation and various national GMCKS institutes — have carried the teaching forward, training new instructors and translating his texts into dozens of languages, though no single successor has assumed the founder's original singular authority over the system.

Theology and Belief — Prana, the Aura, and the Chakras

At the center of Pranic Healing's belief system is prana — described as a vital, invisible life energy drawn from three sources: solar prana (absorbed from sunlight), air prana (absorbed through breathing), and ground prana (absorbed through the soles of the feet from the earth). This is functionally the same concept as chi in Traditional Chinese Medicine or ki in Japanese healing systems, and Pranic Healing texts openly acknowledge the parallel.

The aura, in this framework, is not a single field but a layered energy body surrounding the physical form, commonly described as having an inner aura closest to the skin and an outer aura extending several inches to a few feet beyond it. Health, in Pranic Healing theory, is a matter of the aura's energetic cleanliness and balance: diseased or stagnant energy accumulates in specific areas (often corresponding to the location of physical or emotional complaints), and physical illness is understood to often first manifest as a disturbance in this energy field before appearing in the physical body — a claim central to the system's rationale for early intervention through energy work.

Chakras — a concept borrowed from Indian yogic tradition — are treated as the major energy centers through which prana enters, circulates, and is distributed throughout the body. Pranic Healing's chakra system draws on, but does not exactly duplicate, the classical seven-chakra model familiar from Hatha Yoga; instead it teaches an expanded set of eleven major chakras used specifically for diagnostic scanning and treatment.

The Eleven Major Chakras

The eleven major chakras used in Pranic Healing practice, as taught in the Basic and Advanced curricula, are:

- Crown chakra — associated with the pineal gland and spiritual connection.
- Ajna (brow) chakra — associated with the pituitary gland and mental clarity.
- Forehead chakra — associated with lower mental faculties and concrete thinking.
- Throat chakra (front and back) — associated with communication and the thyroid.
- Heart chakra (front and back) — associated with the thymus, emotions, and the immune system.
- Solar plexus chakra (front and back) — associated with the digestive organs and emotional stability.
- Navel chakra — associated with the intestines and vitality.
- Meng Mein chakra (lower back) — regarded as regulating energy pressure to the kidneys and the rest of the body, a concept without a direct classical-yoga equivalent.
- Basic (root) chakra — associated with the reproductive organs and physical vitality.
- Sex chakra — associated with the reproductive and urinary systems.
- Secondary chakras on the palms, soles of the feet, and knees — used specifically for projecting and receiving energy during treatment.

Practitioners are taught to "scan" this chakra map with the hands, sensing for depletion (a cold, empty, or weak sensation) or congestion (a hot, dense, or heavy sensation) at each point, which then guides where sweeping and energizing techniques are applied.

Color Pranas and the Language of Energy

Advanced Pranic Healing introduces the use of color-coded pranas, in which practitioners visualize and project specific colors of energy believed to carry distinct therapeutic properties. White (or golden) prana is treated as an all-purpose healing energy for beginners; green prana is used for general disinfecting and cleansing; orange prana is associated with the mobilization of energy and treatment of bones and skeletal issues; and violet is reserved for advanced-level practitioners for accelerated healing of serious conditions. Students are cautioned in the official curriculum to use only the colors appropriate to their certification level, since more "potent" colors are taught as carrying greater risk of energetic overload if misapplied.

A Basic Pranic Healing Session — Step by Step

A standard Basic Pranic Healing session, as taught in the foundational course, follows a consistent sequence. No physical touch is used at any point; the practitioner's hands remain several inches from the recipient's body throughout.

- 1. Invocation — the practitioner briefly centers themselves and, in many lineages, silently states an invocation asking for guidance and protection before beginning, consistent with the system's spiritual framing.
- 2. Scanning — the practitioner passes an open hand slowly over the recipient's aura and chakras, sensing (through temperature, pressure, or tingling sensations reported by practitioners) for areas of depleted or congested energy, effectively building an energetic "map" of the problem area.
- 3. Sweeping (cleansing) — using brushing hand motions a few inches above the skin, the practitioner "sweeps" the identified area, described as removing diseased or used-up energy from the aura and chakras, often shaking the hands periodically to disperse the energy that has been removed.
- 4. Energizing — the practitioner projects fresh prana (commonly visualized as white or green light) into the cleansed area, using techniques taught to direct energy from the practitioner's own energy centers, through the hands, and into the recipient's chakras and aura.
- 5. Stabilizing — the newly projected energy is "sealed" or stabilized with light sweeping strokes so that it is not immediately dispersed.
- 6. Releasing used energy — the practitioner is trained to consciously release the energy drawn off during sweeping (commonly visualized as being disposed of into the ground or a bowl of salt water) rather than absorbing it themselves, and to wash their hands under running water at the session's end as a further cleansing step.

A full session for a specific complaint typically lasts fifteen to thirty minutes and can be repeated over subsequent days for chronic conditions; the system also teaches self-scanning and self-treatment techniques so that practitioners are not solely dependent on a second person.

The Meditation on Twin Hearts

The single most widely taught and most public-facing practice associated with Pranic Healing is the Meditation on Twin Hearts, a guided group meditation Choa Kok Sui developed and popularized as a standalone practice separate from one-on-one healing sessions. It combines the activation of the heart and crown chakras with the deliberate visualization of blessing the earth with loving-kindness and peace, followed by a period of stillness.

The meditation is structured, in its standard form, around invoking divine blessing, activating and "illuminating" the heart and crown chakras simultaneously, radiating loving-kindness outward to the world, and finally releasing the built-up energy in a blessing directed toward the planet before settling into silent meditation. Pranic Healing organizations promote it as being suitable for people of any or no religious background, and it is regularly taught as a free, drop-in public practice at Pranic Healing centers, wellness expos, and community events worldwide — functioning as both an outreach tool for the organization and a stated daily self-care practice for practitioners.

Self-Care and Daily Practice

Beyond formal healing sessions, Pranic Healing teaches a set of basic techniques intended for daily personal use by laypeople who have completed the introductory course:

- Self-scanning — periodically checking one's own chakras and general energy level for depletion or congestion, used as an early-warning practice before symptoms become physical.
- General self-cleansing — a simplified sweeping routine applied to one's own aura, often done in the shower or upon waking, intended to clear accumulated "used" or negative energy absorbed from crowded environments or stressful interactions.
- General self-energizing — directing fresh prana into one's own major chakras to restore vitality after fatigue or stress, using breathing and visualization rather than physical hand contact.
- Daily practice of the Meditation on Twin Hearts — recommended by teaching centers as a short daily or several-times-weekly discipline, framed as supporting both physical vitality and emotional/spiritual balance.
- Hygiene and grounding rules — practitioners are taught to always wash their hands after a session, avoid healing work while eating meat heavily or drinking alcohol on the day of practice, and to consciously ground and release energy rather than holding onto it, all framed as protecting the practitioner's own energy field from overload.

These self-care techniques are explicitly taught in the entry-level Basic Pranic Healing course, meaning a substantial portion of the curriculum is oriented toward personal maintenance rather than treating others.

Institutions, Training, and Certification

Pranic Healing is administered globally through a network of affiliated but independently operating organizations, the largest and most visible being the World Pranic Healing Foundation and a constellation of national and regional foundations and study centers carrying the "GMCKS" (Grand Master Choa Kok Sui) branding — including bodies such as the Pranic Healing Foundation of the Philippines, MCKS Yoga Vidya Pranic Healing foundations across India, and dozens of national centers across Europe, the Americas, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia.

Training follows a tiered certification path:

- Basic Pranic Healing — the entry-level course, typically taught over one or two days, covering the theory of prana and the aura, chakra scanning, sweeping, energizing, and basic self-healing.
- Advanced Pranic Healing — introduces color pranas and more specific protocols for a wider range of physical ailments.
- Pranic Psychotherapy — applies the technique to emotional and psychological issues, including the clearing of negative emotional "thoughtforms."

- Pranic Crystal Healing, Pranic Face Lifting, Pranic Feng Shui, and other specialty courses — later additions extending the core technique into cosmetic, environmental, and other niche applications.
- Arhatic Yoga — described by the organization as a higher, more intensive spiritual practice combining meditation, energy work, and character-building disciplines, generally reserved for students who have completed the core healing curriculum and made a deeper personal commitment to the system.

Instructors are certified as Pranic Healing teachers only after completing this full sequence and additional instructor training, and centers operate largely on a franchise-like model of licensed instructors teaching standardized curricula under the GMCKS or World Pranic Healing Foundation name.

Legacy, Global Spread, and Philanthropy

From its founding in the Philippines in the 1980s, Pranic Healing expanded rapidly through the 1990s and 2000s into a genuinely global movement, with training centers and foundations now active across South and Southeast Asia (with particularly strong followings in India and the Philippines), the Middle East, Europe, and the Americas. Its books have been translated into dozens of languages, and its founder-branded institutes continue to operate independently of one another under the shared GMCKS name.

A significant part of the system's public identity is its philanthropic arm. Choa Kok Sui and his successor organizations established charitable bodies — including the MCKS Charitable Foundation and related national trusts — that run food-distribution programs, disaster relief, and community health initiatives, often staffed by volunteer graduates of the Pranic Healing courses as a form of service tied to their training. Some Pranic Healing centers and volunteer groups have also pursued informal integration with wellness settings, offering complementary energy-healing sessions alongside conventional care in hospices, community health fairs, and wellness centers in various countries, though such integration remains at the level of individual institutions and volunteer arrangements rather than formal endorsement by mainstream medical bodies.

The Meditation on Twin Hearts in particular has become the system's most widely recognized public offering, drawn on by community groups, schools, and even some corporate wellness programs as a free, non-denominational group practice independent of the healing technique itself.

Controversies and a Fair Accounting

The central and most consistent criticism of Pranic Healing from the scientific and skeptical community is definitional: mainstream physics and physiology have no confirmed mechanism corresponding to prana, the aura, or the eleven-chakra energy map the system describes, and no controlled biophysical measurement has demonstrated that a practitioner's hands are transmitting a detectable form of healing energy. Prominent skeptics of complementary medicine, including the physician-researcher Edzard Ernst, have characterized Pranic Healing's underlying theoretical framework as unsupported by physical evidence, and some skeptic organizations classify the system as a form of pseudoscience alongside other energy-healing modalities such as Reiki and Therapeutic Touch.

On the clinical evidence side, the picture is mixed rather than uniformly negative. A small number of peer-reviewed studies — including at least one randomized, double-blind controlled trial published in an Indian psychiatry journal examining Pranic Healing as an adjuvant treatment for mild-to-moderate depression, and smaller trials on pain and cardiorespiratory measures during pediatric procedures — have reported statistically favorable results for Pranic Healing groups compared to controls. However, this literature is limited in volume, has generally not been independently replicated at scale, and sits within the same broader evidence problem that affects most touch- and energy-based complementary therapies: small sample sizes, difficulty blinding practitioners, and reliance on subjective or self-reported outcome measures. Systematic reviews of related "distant healing" and energy-healing modalities more broadly have found the overall evidence base inconclusive.

A second, smaller thread of controversy is organizational rather than scientific: following Choa Kok Sui's death in 2007, leadership of the movement fragmented across multiple national foundations and GMCKS-branded centers operating with varying degrees of independence from one another, and practitioner communities have at times disagreed over doctrinal authority, licensing, and the use of the founder's name and materials — disputes that remain internal to the movement and are not well documented in independent sources.

A fair account of the field notes that Pranic Healing organizations themselves generally do not claim to replace medical treatment, consistently instructing students to refer serious conditions to physicians and framing the technique as complementary self-care and stress reduction. Many practitioners and recipients report subjective benefits — relaxation, reduced anxiety, and a sense of well-being — that are consistent with the general, well-documented effects of calm, attentive human ritual and expectation (a placebo-adjacent effect common across complementary practices), even where the system's specific energetic explanation for those benefits remains scientifically unverified.

Closing Statement

Pranic Healing asks a reader to hold two things at once: a founder's confident claim that the body's energy can be scanned and cleaned by trained hands, and a scientific establishment that has found no confirmed mechanism by which that could work. Both are part of the honest record.

What is not in dispute is the scale of what Grand Master Choa Kok Sui built — a codified, teachable technique; a worldwide network of schools and foundations; and a charitable arm that has fed and housed people in his name for more than two decades after his death.

For those wishing to move from understanding to practice, structured instruction in Pranic Healing is available through I.Q. Productionz.com — see the Rates and Learn sections of the site for course details.