Haligricity

HALIGRICITY — A PHILOSOPHY

A COMPLETE DEEP DIVE

The Beliefs, the Roots, and the Reclamation Beneath the Practice

---

This book holds the beliefs, the mysticism, and the why. It is not the single foundational Haligric text — there isn't one. The Book of Well-Being holds the practices, the Book of Rituals holds the ceremonies, the Controversial Manual holds the sacred creative center, and the wider Haligricity history library — the Convergences Compilation, the Gods of the World Compendium, the Calendar of Dates Honored, the Dreamworld deep dive, and dozens more, spanning traditions, astrology, and other avenues of mysticism — holds the rest, compiled for study in pieces, to be explored as each reader is led by their own spirit.

This book holds only the worldview beneath all of it. What follows is offered as a synthesis perspective for the general reader — the convergence points across the world's traditions, and the reclamation of power at the center of all of it.

Contents

What Is Haligricity?.....3
Where Haligricity Comes From.....5
The Divine Lives Within You.....7
Energy, Vibration, and the Universal Laws.....8
Reclaiming Power — Why Haligricity Exists.....10
The Haligric Commons — Gathering Without Hierarchy.....11
The Sacred Self — Divinity, Self-Care, and Sovereignty.....13
Sacred Language — Words as Spells.....15
The Sacred Creative Center.....16
Trauma, the Body, and Ancestral Lineage.....17
The Afterlife — What Haligricity Believes.....18
Mystical Beings and the Unseen.....22
Holistic Healthcare.....23
Sources and Recommended Reading.....24

What Is Haligricity?

Every situation and word combination is spiritual. Look deeper; higher realms are always speaking.
— Hali Sarah Parsons, Real Magic: An Introduction (2015)

The kingdom is inside of you, and outside of you. Split a piece of wood — I am there.
— Gospel of Thomas

The power of God is with you at all times — through the activities of mind, senses, breathing, and emotions — and is constantly doing all the work, using you as a mere instrument.
— Bhagavad Gita

As above, so below; as below, so above; as within, so without.
— The Emerald Tablet, Hermes Trismegistus

Every religion in recorded human history has tried to answer the same three questions: where do we come from, where do we go when this body goes still and lifeless, and how should we spend the time we are given in between. Strip away the specific gods, the specific rituals, the specific holy days and holy books, and what remains in every tradition surveyed across this entire library is that same three-part inquiry, answered differently by different peoples in different centuries, but never a different question. Haligricity is not a new answer added on top of the others. It is what remains when the convergent answers already given are gathered honestly and lived: we come from the same source; we return to it, still whole; and the years between are best spent operating with respect — for the self, for each other, and for everything else that shares this life with us.

Haligricity is not a religion. The word religion implies an institution, a hierarchy of worthy and unworthy, a set of rules administered by those with authority over those without. Haligricity has none of these things. It is a synthesis — a living gathering of the world's most luminous mystical wisdom, brought together not to flatten the traditions that produced it but to honor the convergence points where they all say the same thing.

When Taoism, Advaita Vedanta, the Bhagavad Gita, Sufism, Christian mysticism, the Yoruba tradition, the I AM Activity, Egyptian Hermeticism, Druidic philosophy, Gnosticism, Kabbalah, Rastafari, Shamanism, Native American wisdom, and quantum physics arrive independently at the same recognition — that the divine lives within every being, that consciousness creates reality, that all things are interconnected — that convergence is worth paying attention to. That convergence is Haligricity's foundation.

Haligricity holds one non-negotiable recognition above all others: you are not a human being having occasional spiritual experiences. You are a spiritual being, living a human experience, in a body that is a divine instrument, on a planet that is a living teacher, in a universe that is entirely conscious and entirely responsive to your attention.

The Haligric Vocabulary

- Haligrist: The practitioner — one who lives the Haligric path.
- Haligricity: The overarching synthesis — the philosophy and living worldview.
- Haligric: Of or relating to the path and its expressions. A Haligric meal. The Haligric rise.
- Varessence: A spoken declaration of truth into light. From Var- (truth, voice) + essence (presence). Not a prayer — a declaration. You are not asking for light; you are acknowledging that the light is you. Coined by Hali Sarah Parsons.
- Tetralty: The fourfold integration — Feel, Think, Speak, Do. The four dimensions of conscious human creation. Coined by Hali Sarah Parsons.

The Etymology of the Name

The name was built deliberately, layer by layer, and each one carries real philosophical weight rather than decoration.

- Helios: The Greek word for the sun — the visible source of light, life, and warmth, and the root beneath the Heliopolitan philosophy that wove the sun into the daily cycle of breath and renewal. This is one of the threads in Haligricity's name: light is not separate from us. We are warmed by it, fed by it, and carry a version of it inside our own field.
- Hologram: Every part of a hologram contains the information of the entire whole. This is the structural metaphor of Haligricity — each person, each practice, each tradition reflects the whole. You are not a fragment trying to become complete; you are a fractal of the infinite, already carrying the pattern of the whole within you.
- Hala: Reaches in three directions at once — Halo (the radiant ring of energy visible in harmony), the circle or cycle (the eternal rotation of the seasons, the breath, the body's rhythms), and Halal (that which is pure and permissible). A Haligric life is energetically clean.
- Holi- / Halig- / Holy: The word holy comes from Old English hālig, from Proto-Germanic *hailagaz, from *hailaz — meaning whole, uninjured, of good omen. That same root gave English the words whole and heal. So at its core: holy = whole = healed — not set apart in a distant, untouchable sense, but intact, complete, nothing missing. The narrower sense of "consecrated to God" came later, as the Christian church narrowed the word. The original charge was simpler: that which is whole cannot be broken.
- Hali: Hali Sarah Parsons recognized her own name embedded in the word she was coining. The founder's philosophy and the founder's identity cannot be separated — Haligricity is a lived system, not an abstracted one.
- Haile / Halle: In the Ge'ez and Amharic languages of Ethiopia — the liturgical tongue of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and the living language of Rastafari — Haile means Power. Haile Selassie I's name literally means Power of the Trinity. Read through this lens, Haligricity is also Power-Gricity: the electricity of power, the current of wholeness made active.
- -icity: From the Latin -itas fused with the Greek -ikos, appearing in words like electricity and authenticity — pointing to a living quality or force inherent in something. Electricity itself comes from the Greek ēlektron (amber), the first recorded observation of static charge: an invisible force, felt before it was measured. Haligricity borrows this suffix to name a current, not a static belief system — you do not practice Haligricity, you conduct it.
- -gricity (from city, not -ism): An -ism is a closed system. A city is a place where everyone is welcome. The suffix signals radical inclusion — no membership requirement, no worthiness test.

The Haligric Symbol

The symbol of Haligricity is a circle with a square inscribed inside it, all four corners of the square touching the circle's edge precisely. The square represents the Tetralty — the four dimensions of conscious human creation: Feel, Think, Speak, Do. The circle represents the interconnectedness of all things — the cosmos, the eternal cycle, the wholeness that contains everything. Together the symbol declares the central truth: the measurable and the infinite are not separate. The four corners of the square touching the circle's edge mean that what you feel, think, speak, and do IS the meeting point of heaven and earth.

Ancient Chinese cash coins share this exact geometry: a square hole inside a round coin — Earth within Heaven. In Western alchemy, squaring the circle was the central alchemical quest. The Haligric symbol says: it is already done. Every moment you align your Feeling, Thinking, Speaking, and Doing, the circle and the square are one.

Where Haligricity Comes From

Haligricity honors every tradition that has contributed to its understanding and is explicit about those origins. Nothing here is presented as invented by Hali Sarah Parsons. The Tetralty and the Varessence are the two terms she coined; everything else has deep roots that are named and credited. What Haligricity does is recognize where these roots intertwine — where traditions that never spoke to each other say the same thing — and gather that convergence into a living philosophy for modern life.

This chapter is a brief orientation only, not the full record. The complete tradition-by-tradition account — where Haligricity's own philosophy and practice converge with each tradition surveyed, and exactly where the line is drawn and that tradition's own closed, protected knowledge is left untouched — lives in its own dedicated volume, Haligricity and the World's Traditions: Convergences and Distinctions, part of the wider Haligricity history library described at the end of this book. This chapter names the roots; that volume shows the work.

The Philosophical Backbone

Taoism gives Haligricity its understanding of the Tao as the underlying flow of all reality and wu wei as effortless right action; Mantak Chia's Universal Healing Tao system gives it the practical energetic language of the body — the three treasures (Jing, Chi, Shen), the Microcosmic Orbit, the Inner Smile, the dantian. Advaita Vedanta's non-dual teaching that Atman is Brahman — the individual self is the ultimate divine reality, with no separation — is the philosophical heart of what this book holds about self and divine, most precisely stated in the Upanishads' four Great Sayings. The Bhagavad Gita's 700 verses on duty, action, and the self who is essentially divine give this synthesis some of its clearest and most quotable teaching on living aligned rather than attached to outcome.

> You have the right to your actions, but never to the fruits of your actions. Act for the action's sake.
> — Bhagavad Gita 2.47

New Thought — Louise Hay, Neville Goddard, Ernest Holmes, Florence Scovel Shinn — and the I AM Activity's teaching of the Mighty I AM Presence give Haligricity its practical engine: the understanding that thought is cause and reality is effect, and that the divine self is already present, requiring recognition rather than acquisition.

The Divine Feminine, Reclaimed

Gnosticism's Sophia myth, Kabbalah's Shekinah, and the suppression of the divine feminine across patriarchal religion generally are named here because this book's chapter on Reclaiming Power depends on them: the same pattern that erased women's authority in the human realm was mirrored into theology as the erasing of the feminine face of God. Haligricity restores her — Isis, Hathor, Sekhmet, Ma'at, Sophia, the Shekinah, Oshun, Oya, Changing Woman, White Buffalo Calf Woman, Ixchel among the names this synthesis actively brings back to the center of the circle.

Ashe, Heka, and the Word Made Power

The Yoruba tradition gives Haligricity Ashe — the divine creative power flowing through all things and the power to make what one says become real — named throughout every Haligric book with full acknowledgment of its West African origin. Ancient Egypt gives Haligricity Heka — the understanding that a sacred word, spoken, creates what it names — along with Ma'at (truth and balance as the measure of a life) and a many-part soul theology (Ka, Ba, Akh, Ren, Sheut) that shaped this book's own chapter on the afterlife. Sufism's dhikr, Sikhism's Naam and Kirtan, and Shinto's Musubi each independently arrived at the same recognition in their own language: sound and word are creative force, not decoration.

The Western Esoteric Line

The Eleusinian Mysteries, Pythagoras, Neoplatonism, and the Hermetic tradition form the transmission line — Egyptian Heka and Thoth merging with Hermes Trismegistus, then Rosicrucianism, then Freemasonry — that carried this same recognition into the modern West. The Tetralty's four dimensions map cleanly onto the alchemical four stages of the Great Work: Feeling to Nigredo, Thinking to Albedo, Speaking to Citrinitas, Doing to Rubedo. Christian mysticism — Meister Eckhart, Julian of Norwich — preserved the same claim inside institutional Christianity: 'the eye through which I see God is the same eye through which God sees me.'

Reclamation and Liberation

Rastafari's insistence that spiritual practice which ignores systemic oppression is incomplete, and its concept of I and I — the divine is not outside but IS the innermost self — sits directly beside this book's own chapter on reclaiming suppressed power. Native American wisdom's Mitakuye Oyasin — all my relations — is among the most complete statements anywhere in this survey that interconnectedness is not metaphor but physics: the oxygen in your lungs was exhaled by a tree.

Traditions Held in Full Elsewhere

Druidic philosophy's Awen and threefold path, Paganism and Wicca's Wheel of the Year, Traditional Chinese Medicine and Chinese Folk Religion's body-clock and ancestor practice, the Mesoamerican Tzolk'in and Haab calendars, the Bengali Patua's refusal to wall off one sacred story from another, and Reiki's universal life energy each contribute a specific thread named throughout this book's later chapters. Every one of these traditions, along with dozens more — Vodou, Candomble and Umbanda, Ethiopian Orthodoxy, Zoroastrianism, Jainism, Aboriginal Dreamtime, Bobo Bwa, Zulu, Akan, and far beyond — has its own full deep dive in the wider Haligricity history library, detailed at the close of this book. This chapter is the map; that library is the territory.

The Divine Lives Within You

This is the central belief of Haligricity and the one from which every other belief radiates outward. The divine does not live above you, judging from a distance. It lives within you, as you. You are not a flawed human being hoping for divine grace from outside. You are a divine being in human form, temporarily identified with a body and a story, on the way back to the recognition of what you always already are.

If you believe we came from a creator, then caring for yourself honors that creator's work. If you believe in a universal energy, then keeping your energy healthy keeps the universal energy healthy. If you believe in nothing beyond what you can feel — then the warmth of your aliveness and the love that moves through you when someone you care for enters the room are already the sacred. No additional equipment required.

This is Haligricity's most direct claim, and the one every practice in the Well-Being and Rituals books ultimately serves: the divine, or God, or All That Is — whatever word a practitioner's own background makes most honest — is not a being located somewhere else, watching. It is the animating presence in every person and every thing: the current running through the plant on the windowsill, the stranger on the train, the water in the glass, and the practitioner's own body. Nothing needs to be earned to access it, because nothing was ever actually separate from it.

The Tetralty — Feel, Think, Speak, Do

The Tetralty is Hali Sarah Parsons's original contribution to the philosophy of consciousness — the one genuine coinage in this synthesis. Most spiritual traditions acknowledge a trinity — body, mind, spirit; thought, word, deed. Haligricity adds the dimension those trinities are missing: Feeling. What you feel is not a prelude to your thinking — it is a dimension of its own, with its own intelligence and its own guidance system.

- Feel: The intelligence of the emotional body. Not sentiment — information. Every emotion is a messenger from the deepest self about the quality of what is present.
- Think: The intelligence of the mind. Perception, analysis, meaning-making, the ability to hold complexity and navigate it.
- Speak: The bridge between inner reality and outer world. Words carry the frequency of what you feel and think into the shared field of reality. Words are spells. Spelling contains spell.
- Do: The completion of the circuit. Action is where the invisible becomes visible, where intention meets the world and is tested.

The Tetralty is represented by the square in the Haligric symbol — four corners, four dimensions, in perfect balance within the circle of the infinite. Do my feelings reflect my truth? Do my thoughts support my highest good? Do my words carry the energy I want to put into the world? Do my actions match what I claim to believe? These four questions are the complete spiritual audit.

The Varessence — Speaking Truth Into Light

The Varessence is the Haligric declaration — the spoken act of supercharging intention through vibration. It is not a prayer. You are not asking for anything. You are acknowledging what already is. When you speak a Varessence, you are not asking the universe to deliver something. You are claiming what is already true about you, spoken in the specific vibration of your own voice, with your full Tetralty alignment behind the words.

The Varessence corresponds to the Yoruba Ashe, the Sufi dhikr, the Sikh Naam, the Egyptian Heka, and the Shinto musubi. Every tradition has recognized this. Haligricity names it the Varessence and makes it a daily practice. There are three formal Varessences in the Haligric path — the Rising, the Astral, and the Zenith — plus any personally spoken declaration made with full Tetralty alignment, documented in full in the Book of Rituals.

Energy, Vibration, and the Universal Laws

Energy as Currency

Everything is energy interacting with energy. At the subatomic level, all matter is patterns of energy. The body is a field of energy that happens to have a physical expression. Your thoughts are energy. Your emotions are energy. Your words carry energetic frequencies that affect the fields of everyone who receives them. Your attention is the most powerful directed energy you possess — wherever it goes, it organizes the field in that direction.

Haligricity understands energy as currency: it can be built, spent, invested, wasted, or transformed. High-quality energy — flowing from genuine emotional alignment, clear intention, conscious speech, and purposeful action — is the currency with which a Haligrist navigates life.

Emotions as Sacred Guidance

In the dominant cultural paradigm, emotions are problems to be managed or suppressed. In Haligricity they are messengers to be heard — information from the deepest self, not obstacles between you and your best self. Fear says: pay attention here. Anger says: a boundary has been crossed. Grief says: something you loved mattered. Joy says: this is true for you.

Geraldine Orozco's work — documented in her Self Love Sundays series and through the GPAC energetic hygiene model — teaches that emotional energy is our most valuable creative currency because it IS creative life force. When we suppress rather than process, we fragment our field. Healing emotional suppression is energetic maintenance of our primary creative capacity.

> Your emotional energy is your most valuable currency because that is creative light force. Your ability to participate in co-creation of this dimensional reality is all in your emotions.
> — Geraldine Orozco, Self Love Sundays

The Observer Effect

Quantum physics has demonstrated what mystical traditions have always taught: at the subatomic level, particles behave differently when observed than when unobserved. The act of watching changes what is being watched. Consciousness participates in the creation of reality. The universe at its most fundamental level is not a passive backdrop on which your life happens — it is a responsive field that registers and reflects your attention, belief, and vibrational frequency.

The DNA Phantom Effect — You Are Never Disconnected

In research reported in the journal Advances in 1993, the United States Army conducted experiments to determine whether the emotional connection between a person and their own cells continues following physical separation. Researchers collected DNA samples from volunteers, isolated them in another room, and showed the donors video images designed to elicit genuine emotional responses. Every time the donor experienced an emotional peak or valley, the DNA in the other room showed a powerful electrical response at the exact same instant — no time delay, regardless of distance.

In a companion experiment by Dr. Vladimir Poponin at the Russian Academy of Sciences, photons placed in a vacuum chamber were found randomly distributed. When human DNA was introduced, the photons rearranged into a precise pattern — and maintained that pattern for up to 40 days after the DNA was removed. This is the DNA Phantom Effect: DNA leaves an energetic imprint in the field it has occupied, even after the physical molecule is gone. The implications for Haligricity are direct. Every person you have ever loved carries your energetic imprint. Those who have passed do not simply disappear — they leave their pattern in the field of everyone and everything they were intimately connected to.

The Hundredth Monkey Effect

The Hundredth Monkey Effect — Lyall Watson's account, in Lifetide (1979), of a new potato-washing behavior appearing simultaneously among macaque monkeys on separate, non-contacting islands once it reached a critical threshold on the original island — points toward what Rupert Sheldrake calls morphic resonance: when enough individuals within a species hold a new understanding, that understanding becomes available to the whole through the field. The specific details of Watson's account remain debated, but the underlying claim is central to Haligric practice: your inner transformation does not stay inside you. The Haligric practice is not merely personal. It is a contribution to the collective field of human consciousness.

The Seven Hermetic Principles

The Principle of Mentalism

The All is Mind; the Universe is Mental. Reality is fundamentally consciousness. This is the physics of intention work.

The Principle of Correspondence

As above, so below; as below, so above. The pattern of the cosmos is the pattern of the atom. The pattern of your inner world is the pattern of your outer world. And critically for Haligricity: the pattern of the human realm is reflected in the divine realm — this is why the suppression of women below was mirrored into the divine realm above as the erasing of the feminine face of God. The Principle of Correspondence operates in both directions.

The Principle of Vibration

Nothing rests; everything moves; everything vibrates. Matter is simply energy vibrating slowly enough to be dense. Raising vibrational frequency is the practical work of all mysticism.

The Principle of Polarity

Everything is dual; everything has poles. Hot and cold are the same thing at different degrees. This is yin and yang. Neither pole can be eliminated — their creative tension produces the world.

The Principle of Rhythm

Everything flows out and in; everything has its tides. Understanding rhythm allows us to move with cycles rather than being swept by them.

The Principle of Cause and Effect

Every cause has its effect. Nothing happens by chance. Karma in its original philosophical meaning — not punishment but physics.

The Principle of Gender

The masculine and feminine principles — active and receptive, initiating and gestating — manifest at every level of existence. Their union at every scale is the source of all creation.

Reclaiming Power — Why Haligricity Exists

They did not suppress religion. They suppressed power.

Across every continent, across every culture, the story is the same. The sacred groves were cut down. The ceremonies were outlawed. The elders were silenced. Indigenous spiritual traditions — Native American, Polynesian, Zapotec, Druidic, African, Aboriginal — were not simply displaced. They were deliberately destroyed, because they shared one dangerous truth: the divine is not outside of you. It lives within you, within nature, within your ancestors, within the land beneath your feet.

That truth was a threat. A person who knows they carry the sacred within them cannot be controlled the same way. So the suppression was not primarily theological — it was political. Strip a people of their sacred relationship to themselves and to the earth, and you strip them of their self-authority.

Any tradition that said 'the divine lives in you, in nature, in your ancestors, in this land' was a direct threat to any institution that claimed to be the only path to it.
— Haligricity.IQProductionz.com

This history reaches into Europe as well as it does everywhere else. The pre-Christian traditions of the Celtic, Germanic, Norse, Baltic, and Slavic peoples — the Druids, the seasonal Wheel of the Year, the household gods, the sacred groves and stone circles — were the same target under a different sky. Pope Gregory I specifically instructed missionaries to adopt, adapt, and Christianize existing pagan festivals rather than eradicate them outright: Christmas absorbs the Germanic and Norse solstice festival of Yule almost whole — the evergreen tree, the Yule log, the exchange of gifts, the timing itself. Easter absorbs Ostara. Halloween absorbs Samhain. Knowing these roots does not diminish Christianity or any tradition that grew from this layering. It shows how deep the sacred connection to season and cycle runs in the human spirit — deeper than any single religion, deeper than any doctrine, and how much of what looks like conversion was, underneath, continuity wearing a new name.

That is the wound Haligricity was built to heal. Haligricity is the work of reconnection. It is the practice of returning — to the sacred traditions that were taken, to the inner authority that was suppressed, and to the understanding that your body, mind, and spirit are not separate from the divine. They are the access point to it. The purer we become — in what we consume, what we believe, how we care for ourselves, how we move through the world — the more clearly that divinity can move through us.

This is not a passive pursuit. Every act of self-care is a reclamation. Every ceremony honored is perseverance. Every time you choose to listen inward rather than look outward for permission, you are raising the frequency — not just for yourself, but for the planet. We are not separate from the earth's healing. We are the mechanism of it.

> Haligric Lens: This is the theological ground the whole Haligric synthesis stands on. The traditions gathered in the previous chapter were not curiosities collected for their own sake — each survived, in whole or in fragments, a real and often violent attempt to erase the same claim Haligricity now names directly: the sacred lives within, not above. Gathering them back together is itself the reclamation.

The sacred was never lost. It was waiting — for you to remember that you were always the vessel.

The Haligric Commons — Gathering Without Hierarchy

Everything the previous chapter names about suppressed power applies as directly to the shape of a gathering as it does to any individual practice. An institution that seats people in rows, facing forward, listening upward to a single elevated authority, is teaching a lesson in its very architecture before a single word is spoken: that the sacred flows down from one point to many, rather than circulating among everyone present. Haligricity holds that when a group of people choose to gather around this philosophy in physical community, the shape of that gathering should teach the opposite lesson — that everyone in the room is a working part of the same current, not an audience receiving it.

Why Not "Church"

Haligricity avoids the word church deliberately, not out of disrespect for the traditions that use it well, but because the word itself carries specific freight this synthesis does not want to carry. Church descends from the Greek kyriakon, "belonging to the Lord" — a word that names ownership and hierarchy in its very root. Haligricity's own central claim, named throughout this book, is the opposite: the divine belongs to no one and lives within everyone equally, with no institution standing between a person and it. A name that means "belonging to the Lord" was never going to be the right container for a philosophy built on exactly the claim that no one needs an intermediary to belong to the divine.

A Haligric gathering is called The Haligric Commons. "Commons" is chosen for its own real history: land or resource held and shared by an entire community rather than owned or administered by any single authority — the same radical inclusion already named in this book's chapter on the etymology of Haligricity itself, where -gricity was chosen over -icity specifically because a city, unlike an -ism, is a place where everyone is welcome. The Commons is a gathering place in the same spirit: no membership requirement, no worthiness test, no single figure standing at its center.

Circle, Not Rows

Where seating is possible, a Haligric Commons gathers in a circle rather than in rows facing a single front. A circle has no back row and no most-important seat — every position is equidistant from the center, which is the point. This is not a stylistic preference; it is the same geometry as the Haligric symbol itself, the circle holding the Tetralty's square at its center, applied here to the shape of a room rather than the shape of a belief.

Wherever possible, the gathering includes some form of shared activity rather than only shared listening — something every person present touches, holds, or does, so the structure of the hour itself demonstrates the interconnectedness this whole philosophy is built on, rather than only describing it. The prayer stick and the communal songs described below are two specific forms this takes; individual Commons are free to develop their own, so long as the underlying principle holds: everyone present is a participant, not an audience.

The Prayer Stick

A single stick is passed hand to hand around the circle during a Commons gathering. Each person holds it in turn and places a prayer, an intention, or a piece of gratitude into it before passing it on — silently or aloud, whichever the gathering has agreed to. By the time it completes the circle, the stick carries something of everyone present, the same way the DNA Phantom Effect, named earlier in this book, holds that an energetic imprint persists in whatever a person has been in close contact with.

After the gathering closes, the stick is placed somewhere high — traditionally described as the top of a tree, the way a star sits atop a Christmas tree — free of surrounding obstruction, so the wind can carry what has been placed into it outward. Exactly how a given Commons handles this is left to the congregation itself; one workable approach is a rotation, where the stick from the most recent gathering stays elevated overnight before a member retrieves it, and a different stick is raised the following week.

If the divine is already everywhere, as this book holds throughout, height is not where the divine specifically lives, and the practice does not claim otherwise. It is symbolic rather than literal — the same way a candle flame is not treated as containing more of the sacred than the wax around it, but is still the part a practitioner watches. There is a historical echo worth naming honestly: many older churches were built with a copper spire or finial at their highest point, sometimes described as reaching toward the heavens the way the ancient Egyptian pyramids' capstones were oriented toward the sky. The Haligric prayer stick borrows the same instinct without borrowing the theology behind it — height, in this practice, simply means clear of obstruction and open to the wind, so that what has been placed into the stick has somewhere to actually go rather than sitting closed up in a room.

The Grounding Staff

The person speaking during a Commons gathering holds a staff built specifically for this purpose, usually commissioned from an esoteric craftsperson who sets it with stones and copper wiring chosen for the role. What makes this staff distinct from a ceremonial staff in the ordinary sense is a specific functional design: the copper wiring runs from a point where the speaker's hand naturally rests down to the base of the staff, so that when the staff touches the floor during an indoor gathering, the speaker is electrically grounded through it — either by resting the staff's base on a grounding pad, or by wiring the base to connect directly to the building's own grounding wire.

This is the same principle behind earthing, documented in full in the companion Well-Being book: a direct, unbroken conductive path between the body and the earth's own electrical charge. The grounding staff simply extends that same practice to a speaker who is standing, indoors, addressing a group — someone who cannot easily also have bare feet on natural soil during the moment they most need to stay steady and clear.

Gathering Songs

Music opens and closes a Commons gathering, sung together rather than performed for the group. "I Love You Body" and "Good Energy," by New Thought Nursery, are held as Haligric Commons gathering songs. Musicians are welcome to bring and play their own instrument of choice alongside or in place of these — the point of singing together is the same point as the prayer stick and the circle seating: that everyone present is a working part of the gathering, not an audience watching one.

> Haligric Lens: None of this is presented as a fixed or required liturgy. A Haligric Commons is, by design, free to develop its own specific practices so long as they hold to the same underlying principle this whole chapter describes — a gathering shaped so that the sacred is understood to circulate among everyone present, not to flow down from one point at the front of the room.

The Sacred Self — Divinity, Self-Care, and Sovereignty

If the divine genuinely lives within every person and every thing — not as a metaphor but as the operating claim of this entire philosophy — then it lives within you first, before it can be honored anywhere else. This is the belief every other Haligric practice of self-care, boundary, and body ultimately rests on: you are not caring for yourself in addition to caring for the divine. Caring for yourself is caring for the divine, because there is no other place it is more directly reachable to you than through your own body, your own energy, your own life.

Treating Yourself as Divine — Without Entitlement

Haligricity draws a firm line between treating yourself as divine and treating yourself as entitled, and the difference matters enough to state plainly. Entitlement says the world owes you something because of who you are. Sacred self-regard says something quieter and more demanding: because the same divine current that moves through every other person and every other thing also moves through you, you are responsible for how that current is kept — fed, rested, protected, spoken to with respect — the same way you would be responsible for tending any other sacred instrument placed in your care.

This is not a permission slip for carelessness toward others. It is a correction to a much more common and much less examined error: the assumption, absorbed from childhood and from a culture that rewards self-sacrifice as virtue, that everyone else's needs are automatically more legitimate than your own. Haligricity holds both things as true at once — the divine in you deserves the same reverence the divine in anyone else deserves, and no more.

Primary Responsibility — The One Being You Have Complete Power to Care For

Of every relationship a person holds across a lifetime, there is exactly one where full authority and full responsibility sit in the same hands: the relationship with the self. You cannot fully control another person's healing, another person's choices, another person's energy — however much love is offered. You can, with real and complete power, tend your own body, your own rest, your own boundaries, your own energy field. Haligricity names this plainly: self-care is not a lesser, more selfish duty sitting below the duty to others. It is the one duty a person has complete jurisdiction to actually fulfill.

This has a direct and sometimes uncomfortable consequence, and Haligricity does not soften it: there are moments when honoring this responsibility means a practitioner's own needs come before someone else's — not from entitlement, but from the plain fact that neglecting the one being you have complete power over eventually leaves you with nothing left to offer anyone else. A boundary held, a rest taken, a request declined — each of these can be, in the right moment, the most loving and most sacred act available, precisely because it protects the only instrument through which your own portion of the divine can keep moving. This is not a doctrine of selfishness. It is a doctrine of sustainability: the well cannot keep giving water once it has been let run dry.

The Practices That Follow From This Belief

Every specific self-care practice detailed in the Well-Being book — the Sacred Rise, the gua sha and lymphatic work, the earthing, the sound and breath practices, the sacred cookware and eating philosophy — is this same belief made physical. None of it is offered as vanity, wellness-industry aesthetics, or an accessory to spiritual life. It is the direct, hands-on maintenance of a body already understood to be divine instrumentation. Skipping self-care, in this framework, is not a small or harmless lapse; it is a lapse in the one duty a Haligrist has complete power to keep.

Everything and Everyone as Worthy of the Same Respect

The same current that asks a practitioner to honor their own body asks the same practitioner to extend that honoring outward — to other people, to animals, to plants, to the land, to water, to the objects handled in daily life. Mitakuye Oyasin, named in the previous chapters, is not a separate teaching from the sacred self; it is its direct extension. Self-care done honestly does not shrink a person's care for others — it is the precondition for it. A Haligrist who has genuinely tended their own field has more, not less, to offer everyone and everything they touch.

Giving Back — Respect for the Material World

This same respect extends to the objects a Haligrist uses and eventually releases — the plastics, metals, papers, and glass that pass through daily life. Nothing handled is disposable in the deeper sense, even when it is disposable in the practical one. Every object carries the energy of its making and the energy of its use, and how it is released back into the world once its use is finished is itself a sacred act, not an afterthought. 'The earth has been created for me as a place of prostration and a means of purification,' the Prophet Muhammad taught, a hadith collected in Bukhari that grounds environmental stewardship as devotional practice rather than secular obligation. Celtic Druidry held the same recognition in its votive offerings — precious objects deliberately returned to bogs, lakes, and wells as gifts to a land understood to give constantly and deserve reciprocity in kind.

Recycling, in Haligric practice, is this reciprocity made modern. Every plastic bottle, aluminum can, and sheet of paper returned to be remade rather than left to become waste is one fewer extraction the earth is asked to make on a practitioner's behalf — one fewer tree felled, one fewer mine opened, one fewer barrel of oil drawn from ground that would rather have been left undisturbed. This is not a minor housekeeping habit tacked onto a spiritual practice. It is the same respect a Haligrist extends to their own body and to every other person, extended fully to the material world: nothing here is disposable, because nothing here was ever separate from the same current running through everything else.

Be the Change — Beginning Where the Power Actually Is

"Be the change you wish to see in the world" is one of the most quoted lines in modern spiritual and activist language, almost always attributed to Mahatma Gandhi. It is worth stating honestly, in keeping with Haligricity's standard of accuracy: no written record shows Gandhi ever wrote or said this exact phrase. His closest documented statement, from a 1913 piece on collective behavior, reads instead: "If we could change ourselves, the tendencies in the world would also change... We need not wait to see what others do." The polished, quotable phrasing familiar today was coined decades later, in 1974, by the educator Arleen Lorrance as the founding principle of a project she called The Love Project.

Haligricity holds both facts as true and both as useful. Gandhi's actual written words carry the same claim in rougher form, and the popularized version — regardless of its real author — has become one of the clearest short statements anywhere in modern language of what this whole chapter is arguing: that the self is not a small, separate unit sitting outside the work of collective change. It is the unit the change is made of. There is no changed world without changed people, and no changed people without a person willing to start with themselves.

Lauryn Hill's 1998 song "Everything Is Everything" makes the identical claim in a different register, and it is worth naming directly rather than only alluding to. Its refrain holds the same seasonal logic Haligricity uses throughout this book — "after winter, must come spring; change, it comes eventually" — but its clearest statement of where that change actually begins is more direct still:

Let's love ourselves and we can't fail / To make a better situation
— Lauryn Hill, "Everything Is Everything," The Miseducation of Lauryn Hill (1998)

> Haligric Lens: This is the Hundredth Monkey Effect, named in the previous chapter, applied to love rather than to a new behavior: self-love held by enough people becomes, through the field, available to the whole. It is also the Sophia and Shekinah suppression named earlier, answered directly — the divine feminine, and the self more broadly, reclaiming the regard that was taken from her. Loving yourself, in this reading, is not a private indulgence separate from the work of changing the world. It is the work, at its point of origin.

Haligricity's teaching on self-care as primary responsibility and Haligricity's teaching on reclaiming suppressed power, named in the previous chapter, are therefore the same teaching seen from two directions. The power taken from whole peoples across history and the power a single person quietly gives away to guilt, to over-responsibility for others, or to a culture that rewards self-neglect as virtue, are reclaimed by the identical act: turning attention and reverence back toward the one place it was always meant to also live — within.

Sacred Language — Words as Spells

How Creation Began — Feeling, Then Word

Nearly every tradition surveyed in this library locates the beginning of everything in sound. Genesis opens with speech: 'And God said, Let there be light.' The Rig Veda and the Upanishads open with Om, the primordial vibration understood as the sound from which all things emerged. The Gospel of John states the same recognition in different words: 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.' Ancient Egypt went further than almost any other tradition surveyed here: in the Memphite theology, the god Ptah conceived creation in his heart and then spoke it into being through his tongue — thought and word working together to bring the world out of nothing. Heka, the Egyptian concept of magic named earlier in this book, was understood as exactly this: the operative power of speech to make real what it names.

Haligricity holds its own account of how this began, offered here as this synthesis's own creation understanding, standing alongside — never above — every other creation account named in this book. Before there was a word, there was a feeling. Before that feeling could be spoken, it had to be felt completely enough to want form. The feeling gave rise to imagination — the first shape a thing takes before it is real, still unspoken, still only imaginable. Then came the word: the frequency of sound, moving what had only been imagined out of the imaginable and into the tangible. Sound is vibration, and vibration is what moves matter at its smallest scale — the same recognition this book holds throughout, applied here to the first act of creation itself. Haligricity does not claim there was necessarily a single conscious speaker behind that first sound, only that there was a feeling — held by All That Is, whether or not there was yet any one vessel to specifically hold or speak it — so complete that it became sound, and that sound is where everything after it begins.

This is the Tetralty, named earlier in this book, read backward to its own origin: Feel, then Think — the imagining — then Speak, and only after that, Do. The four dimensions of everyday human creation are the same four movements Haligricity holds behind the creation of everything else. And in this reading, every religion's search for where we came from and every religion's search for how to live well converge on the same starting point: a feeling wanted to become real badly enough that it found a voice.

The word 'spelling' contains its own secret. When you spell a word, you are casting a spell. The Hindu Vedas open with sound as the creative force of the universe. The Biblical Gospel of John: 'In the beginning was the Word.' Egyptian Heka — magic — was primarily a technology of language. The Sikh Naam — the divine sound-current. The Yoruba Ashe — the power to make what one says become real. Every tradition that has looked deeply at the nature of reality has arrived at the same recognition: what we speak, we summon.

The practice of analyzing words for their resonance and hidden meanings — examining their phonetic and vibrational qualities rather than only their strict historical roots — appears in spiritual and mystical communities worldwide, most commonly under the name word magic. Linguists call the same phenomenon folk etymology or re-bracketing. In Haligricity's Tetralty, Speaking is the third dimension — the bridge where thought becomes action. Choosing words consciously is choosing reality consciously.

Louise Hay's foundational teaching: the universe, and our own nervous system, does not process the word 'not' the way we assume — it hears the content of what is spoken rather than the negative frame placed around it. Research in cognitive linguistics confirms this: negation is a secondary processing step, and the brain processes the content first, applying the negation afterward, often too late. Rewiring these patterns takes what Real Magic calls conscious, repetitive action — among the most significant adjustments in this synthesis, because the patterns have been hard-grained in us throughout our upbringings and throughout time.

The four specific Haligric language shifts — Grand Rising, Ashe, Be More You, and Accuse Me — are documented in full, with their reasoning, in the Book of Rituals, where they belong among the sacred sayings and ceremonial language of the path.

The Sacred Creative Center

The most powerful energy center in the human body is the sacral center — the seat of all creative and sexual life force, the source of literal new life, the energetic foundation from which all other energy in the system rises. Haligricity understands the systemic suppression of this center — through religious shame, cultural conditioning, and the commercial exploitation of sexuality without its sacred dimension — as a primary mechanism of collective energetic depletion, and a direct extension of the same suppression named in the chapter on reclaiming power.

Sexual energy and creative energy are the same fire burning through the same center. The Taoist three treasures describe the alchemical upward transformation of this energy: Jing (creative-sexual essence) cultivated and transformed into Chi (vital life force), which further refines into Shen (spiritual radiance). This is the path described in different languages by Taoist alchemy, Tantric yoga, Kundalini practice, and the Hermetic tradition. Honoring the sacred creative center — learning to cultivate it rather than unconsciously discharge it — is among the most powerful acts of sovereignty a human being can take.

The lymphatic system — the body's white blood system, its electromagnetic light-water body — is the medium through which the body's sacred regenerative cycle operates. Every thought and emotion leaves a vibrational imprint in the lymph water. The body runs a monthly lunar regeneration cycle and a yearly solar one. The practices that support this cycle — breathwork, diet, lymphatic drainage, earthing, sound work — are detailed in the Well-Being book. The complete sacred secretion theology, including the physiological journey from the claustrum and cerebrospinal fluid through the spinal column, and the specific cultivation practices themselves, are documented in the Controversial Manual and in Real Magic: Book Two — Advanced Practice, for practitioners who feel called to that deeper layer.

Both of those texts sit behind a deliberate threshold on the Haligricity webpage, in the Advanced and Controversial Practices section — not to withhold the material, but to ask that a practitioner arrive at it with intention rather than stumble into it by accident. The access word has always meant exactly what it says: sacred. Entering it unlocks the Controversial Manual in full, along with Real Magic: Book Two — Advanced Practice and its own further material on this same creative center — advanced Reiki protocol, Violet Flame work, Mantak Chia's sexual alchemy, the Menstrual Art tradition, and the complete secretion theology this chapter has only summarized here.

Trauma, the Body, and Ancestral Lineage

Trauma is not what happened to you. It is what got stuck inside you as a result. The nervous system's response to overwhelming experience is to freeze the incomplete survival response in the body's tissues, fascia, and autonomic nervous system. Bessel van der Kolk's landmark research confirmed what energy healers have known for millennia: trauma is physiologically stored in the body and requires body-based approaches for its full release.

Geraldine Orozco's teaching adds a dimension Western psychology has only recently begun to acknowledge: we inherit not only our own stored emotions but entire ancestral patterns — lineages of memory held in the DNA and the field. Epigenetic research of the last two decades confirms this: traumatic experiences leave chemical markers on DNA that can be passed to subsequent generations without the genes themselves changing. The healing work we do is therefore not only personal — it ripples backward through the lineage and forward through everyone whose life we touch. This is the Native American understanding of the seven generations — that every decision be made with its effect seven generations forward in mind — expressed in modern biological language.

Watching Is Experiencing — Screens and the Nervous System

Your nervous system does not distinguish between something you are watching and something you are living through. When you watch a horror film, your cortisol rises. When you watch an act of love, your oxytocin responds. When you watch violence repeatedly, the neural pathways that process violence grow stronger and more accessible. Choosing what we watch is as important as choosing what we eat. Ancient Egyptian Heka — magic as the operative use of words and images — was precisely this understanding applied 5,000 years ago. Every image you consume is a spell being cast on your nervous system. The Haligric principle: consume what you choose to become. Create what you are called to express. Beauty, deliberately consumed, is also medicine — a legitimate healing modality.

The Afterlife — What Haligricity Believes

As we are when we are alive — that is as we are when we have passed. We continue to hold the love we felt, the wisdom we gathered, the curiosity we carried. What changes is our relationship to the physical dimension. We are no longer localized in a body in a specific place. We are everywhere. In everything.

The DNA Phantom Effect supports this directly: the energetic pattern of a person's field persists in the space they occupied and in the fields of those they were intimately connected to. Speaking the names of those who have passed, tending their altars, living through them by expressing what they taught you — this is not sentiment. It is the maintenance of a genuine energetic connection that physics now supports. The longer we keep the memory of those we have lost alive, especially if we share DNA with them, we give their direct essence continued life.

The Soul's Two Halves — Spirit and Soul

Haligricity holds that what animates a person in life divides, at the moment of death, the way the body itself has always been divided — into two halves, left and right, that were never truly separate, only ever expressed as one working whole. One half is the spirit: the animating life force itself, the breath, the current that was never uniquely this person's own to begin with, only borrowed for the length of a life. The other half is the soul: the specific personality, memory, and name that made this particular life recognizably itself, and that only this life carries in exactly this shape.

At death, the spirit half continues. It is not destroyed, and it is not uniquely lost, because it was never uniquely bound to one body — it moves on, whether that movement is understood as returning to the wider current it came from, or as continuing to animate other life that comes after. This is the half that keeps growing, keeps learning, and keeps being spent and renewed the way water is spent and renewed: it evaporates from one place only to rain down and fill another.

The soul half is different. It is the record — the specific memories, the specific love given and received, the specific name — and it does not travel onward the way the spirit does. It rests. It joins what many traditions call the ancestors: not gone, not suffering, simply quiet, the way a book returns to a shelf between readings. It waits to be called.

Ba, Ka, Ren, and Akh — An Older Language for the Same Belief

Ancient Egyptian theology mapped a nearly identical structure thousands of years before Haligricity gave it this language, and naming that precedent honestly is part of the same reclamation this whole book is engaged in. The Ka was the life force — the breath, the vitality, the half of a person that had to be fed, first with real offerings of food and water left at the tomb, and understood in every later age as fed instead by attention, memory, and love. The Ba was the individual personality, drawn as a human-headed bird, free to travel from the body after death and expected to return to it — the part of a person recognizably themselves rather than only their vitality. The Ren was the name, understood as the anchor that let the Ba find its way home and let the Ka know it was still wanted; a name spoken kept a person present, and a name forgotten was, in Egyptian belief, the true second death. When the Ka was fed, the Ba was still able to return, and the Ren was still spoken, a person became Akh: an effective, shining spirit, capable of being called on and still able to act on behalf of the living.

Haligricity reads its own spirit-and-soul division through this older map without claiming to be reconstructing ancient Egyptian religion exactly as it was practiced. The spirit, in Haligric belief, is closest to what the Egyptians called Ka — the borrowed, ever-returning life force. The soul is closest to the Ba — the specific personality that can be visited, spoken to, and called by name. And Akh, the state reached when both halves are still honored, the name still spoken, the memory still kept, and the offerings, however small — a candle, a photograph, a story told to a child — still given, is what Haligricity means when it says someone has become an ancestor rather than simply someone who died.

Water as the Pattern

Haligricity holds the animating spirit as behaving the way water behaves, because the body itself is proof of the same principle: roughly ninety percent water by composition, carrying memory the way water carries mineral, flowing rather than staying still. Spirit poured out returns home and pours out again, already changed by everywhere it has been. This is not a doctrine of loss. Nothing that flows is gone; it is only somewhere else, still moving, still capable of finding its way back the moment someone speaks the name, lights the candle, or tells the story that calls it. The Modern Haligric Burial ceremony, documented in full in the companion Book of Rituals, is this belief made physical — a form built to give the soul half a lasting anchor while the spirit half is trusted to keep flowing on its own.

The Elemental Compass — Body, Direction, and Element

Haligricity extends the Ba-Ka-Ren-Akh framework one layer further, into an elemental compass built from the same Four Sons of Horus who guard the organ vessels in the Modern Haligric Burial. This compass is offered plainly as Haligricity's own synthesis — inspired by Egyptian funerary theology and by the Tetralty named earlier in this book, not a reconstruction of anything the Egyptians themselves taught about elements or chemistry. It exists because the same four-part structure this whole chapter has been describing — a body with four directions, four organs, four watchers — asks a further question worth answering honestly: what, physically, is each direction actually made of.

North holds Earth, and the movement of Do — the direction of building, structure, and endurance. Three elements answer to it together rather than one alone: carbon, the builder, the backbone of every chain the body constructs, from DNA to protein to fat; calcium, the elder, the mineral of bone and tooth that makes a structure last and lets it be remembered; and magnesium, the healer, the softener at the center of hundreds of enzyme processes, the mineral that lets a structure stay flexible enough to survive eighty years of use without breaking. Earth, in this compass, is a trinity rather than a single element, the same way water is a trinity of one oxygen and two hydrogen. Together the three answer a single description: build, endure, heal. North's Watcher is Hapy, the baboon-headed son of Horus who guards the lungs — the organ that turns the surrounding air into something the body can build with — and the soul part that answers to this direction is the Ka, the life force itself, the breath that has to keep being drawn, structure by structure, for any of the rest of the compass to stand.

South holds Fire, and the movement of Think — the spark of decision before any action begins. Phosphorus answers to this direction: the mineral at the center of ATP, the molecule that powers essentially every cellular process in the body; the backbone of DNA and RNA, memory written in a literal chemical sense; and the carrier of the nerve signal, the roughly one hundred billion electrical sparks firing through the brain in any given moment. Thought, in the Haligric reading, is not a soft or passive faculty. It is electric — the lightning that starts a movement before the movement is visible. South's Watcher is Imsety, the human-headed son of Horus who guards the liver — the organ Egyptian medicine held as a seat of vitality and processing rather than only filtration — and the soul part that answers to this direction is the Khat, the physical body itself, the vessel that has to be alive and processing before any spark of decision can become anything at all.

East holds Air, and the movement of Speak — the breath that carries the word out of the body and into the world. Nitrogen answers to this direction, present in every breath and central to the amino acids that build the proteins of speech, thought, and the body itself. Breath is what turns an unspoken feeling into an audible word, the same movement this book's chapter on Sacred Language holds as one of creation's own first movements: feeling becoming sound. East's Watcher is Duamutef, the jackal-headed son of Horus who guards the stomach, and the soul part that answers to this direction is the Ba — the traveling personality, drawn as a human-headed bird, free to leave the body and move through the world the way breath itself moves out and returns. In Egyptian terms, this is the same breath that let the Ba travel and still find its way home by a spoken name — Air carrying Speech carrying Ren toward it.

West holds Water, and the movement of Feel — memory, grief, love, and the pull between people that does not require language to be real. Iron answers to this direction: the mineral at the center of hemoglobin, the magnetic carrier that moves oxygen through every vessel in the body, present in the blood that Egyptian burial theology treats as a living, moving element of the soul, released to running water rather than sealed away. Blood remembers by circulating; iron is the specific mineral reason it can. West's Watcher is Qebehsenuef, the falcon-headed son of Horus who guards the intestines, and the soul part that answers to this direction is the Ren, the name — the address memory and feeling both circle back to, the word that lets grief and love find a specific person to land on rather than dissolving into feeling with nowhere to go. West is where the sun sets, where the Egyptian underworld's rivers run, and where, in this compass, the body does its own quiet work of holding what it has felt.

At the center of the compass sits Spirit and Soul together, and here the elemental reading closes its own circle: water itself, the pattern this chapter has already held as the shape of the animating spirit, is one part hydrogen and two parts oxygen. Hydrogen, the simplest and most abundant element in the universe, is read here as spirit — the single, unsplittable current this chapter described as never uniquely belonging to one body. Oxygen, present in nearly everything the body burns for energy and the specific element that lets iron carry its cargo through the blood, is read here as soul — the carrier, the flow, the medium the spirit actually moves through. The body being built mostly of water is not treated as coincidence in Haligric belief. It is treated as this whole chapter's claim, expressed at the level of chemistry: the practitioner is, quite literally, spirit and soul, bonded together, wearing a body built by earth, sparked by fire, voiced by air, and remembered by water.

The Light Through Many Pyramids — Interconnectedness Across Lives

If the spirit is the borrowed, ever-flowing half described earlier in this chapter, Haligricity holds one further image for how that flowing actually happens across more than one life: light, and the many surfaces it shines through. The essence at the center of a person — closest, in the language of this chapter, to the Ka — does not repeat. It is the one constant, the light itself, never divided by how many places it appears. What repeats are the vessels: each life a different body, a different name, a different set of circumstances built to catch that same light and refract it into a specific, particular, unrepeated shape. A person is not a fragment of that light working to become whole. They are one complete refraction of a light that was never broken to begin with — the same claim this book's opening chapter makes about the hologram at the root of Haligricity's own name, now applied to lifetime rather than to a single body.

This is also, Haligricity holds, the same reason nearly every tradition on earth arrived at many gods rather than staying content with one. Pass a single beam of white light through a prism and it does not weaken — it refracts, becoming a full spectrum of distinct colors, every one of them still that same original light doing what light does when it meets a surface built to divide it. Hinduism counts thirty-three million devas, a number Hindu teachers themselves explain is not meant to be totaled on a census — it means, functionally, infinite: every quality of the one Brahman visible as its own distinct god, worshipped in its own distinct form, without the underlying source ever being less than whole in any single one of them. Haligricity reads every pantheon this way — Egyptian, Yoruba, Norse, Greek, Shinto, Celtic — not as competing claims about how many gods actually exist, but as many prisms turning the same one light into every color it is capable of showing. This is also how creation keeps happening rather than having finished once: every new refraction, every new god named, every new person born to carry the light one more particular way, adds another strand to the same web this chapter has been describing all along. The web is not a finished object being observed. It is still being made, one refraction at a time.

The spirit, in this same image, is the part that travels between those refractions — moving from body to body, from reflection to reflection, the way the Ba was understood to leave the tomb and travel while still needing to find its way home. What lets it find its way, across one lifetime or across many, is the same triad this chapter has already named: water, carrying memory the way it always has in this book; name, the Ren, the address that tells the spirit which vessel is which; and Ka, the breath that proves a given vessel is, for now, alive. Deja vu, the sense of an old soul, the dream that seems to visit somewhere never physically seen — Haligricity holds these as the water finding its way between vessels that were never as separate as they appeared.

This is also where the individual and the collective stop being two different subjects. Mitakuye Oyasin, named earlier in this book as one of the clearest available statements that interconnectedness is physics rather than metaphor, is the same recognition read through this chapter's own light: if every person is a refraction of the same underlying current, then tending another person's field, another tradition's memory, another generation's unfinished grief, is never fully separate from tending one's own. An ancestor, in this reading, is not only a soul at rest waiting to be called. They are a light still visible through every mirror it ever passed through — reachable, on some level, through any one of them, which is part of why a single photograph, a single retold story, or a single object closely associated with a person can carry a genuine and disproportionate weight. The Modern Haligric Burial's practice of setting a person's favorite object into their final form, described in the companion Book of Rituals, rests on exactly this logic: the object is one more surface the same light was already shining through.

None of this asks a practitioner to believe in a specific number of past lives, a specific mechanism of reincarnation, or a specific cosmology of parallel realities. It asks only the same thing every other belief in this book asks: that the current running through one person is not different in kind from the current running through anyone else, anywhere else, in any life — and that becoming an ancestor, in the fullest Haligric sense, means becoming a steady enough light that the people still finding their own way through their own reflections can see by it.

Mystical Beings and the Unseen

Mystical Beings and the Imaginal Realm

In Haligricity we hold this position: if something has been thought of by millions of people across thousands of years, it exists somewhere. Perhaps not in the physical dimension we inhabit in this body — but in the infinite field of consciousness, thought creates. Dragons, unicorns, faeries, phoenixes, elementals, Naga, Kirin, Thunderbirds, Apsara — all are honored as genuine beings of the imaginal realm, carrying specific energies and teaching specific lessons. The Ascended Masters of the I AM Activity, the Bodhisattvas of Buddhism, the angels of the Abrahamic traditions, the orishas of West African and diaspora traditions, and the kami of Shinto are all honored as real energies that can be called upon, learned from, and offered gratitude.

Cats and the Unseen Spectrum

Ancient Egyptians revered cats as sacred beings for reasons contemporary science is beginning to validate. Cats can see into the near-ultraviolet range of the spectrum, invisible to human eyes. Contemporary research also confirms that humans emit ultraviolet bioluminescence from the skin — meaning cats may literally see aspects of the human energy field we cannot perceive in ourselves. They may see the aura, or something like it. The purr of a cat falls within a frequency range documented to promote bone healing, reduce inflammation, lower blood pressure, and calm the nervous system. Haligricity honors cats as fellow beings with their own form of perception and genuine healing capacity.

Holistic Healthcare

Haligricity strongly encourages a holistic approach to the whole body, with a strong emphasis on the importance of emotions as primary health indicators. We support naturopathic healthcare alongside conventional medicine — never one to the exclusion of the other. We recognize that how one event affects a person depends entirely on who that person is and what their past experiences have been. No one situation affects one person the way it does another. All experiences that impact a person are respected, and finding support to work through, heal, and release their effects from the body is strongly encouraged.

We honor astrology and the effect of planetary alignment on our experiences. The moon pulls the tides of the ocean; it also moves the waters within us. Understanding these cycles — not as fate but as energetic context — allows the Haligrist to move with the current rather than against it.

Sources and Recommended Reading

Primary Sources

Parsons, Hali Sarah. Real Magic: An Introduction. Copyright 2015. First Edition February 10, 2017. realmagicintro.wixsite.com/mymagicworkbook

Parsons, Hali Sarah. Real Magic: Book Two — Advanced Practice. Haligricity, 2026.

The Haligric Book of Well-Being. Haligricity, 2026.

The Haligric Book of Rituals. Haligricity, 2026.

Taoism

Laozi. Tao Te Ching. Recommended translations: Stephen Mitchell (1988), Ursula K. Le Guin (1997).

Chia, Mantak. Awaken Healing Energy Through the Tao. Aurora Press, 1983.

Chia, Mantak. Cosmic Nutrition. Destiny Books, 2012.

Indian Philosophy and the Bhagavad Gita

The Upanishads. Trans. Eknath Easwaran. Nilgiri Press, 2007.

The Bhagavad Gita. Trans. Eknath Easwaran. Nilgiri Press, 2007.

Nisargadatta Maharaj. I Am That. Trans. Maurice Frydman. Acorn Press, 1973.

New Thought and I AM Tradition

Hay, Louise. You Can Heal Your Life. Hay House, 1984.

Goddard, Neville. The Power of Awareness. DeVorss, 1952.

Holmes, Ernest. The Science of Mind. Tarcher/Penguin, 1926.

Shinn, Florence Scovel. The Game of Life and How to Play It. 1925.

Ballard, Guy. Unveiled Mysteries. Saint Germain Press, 1934.

Egyptian, Hermetic, and Gnostic Traditions

Budge, E.A. Wallis. The Egyptian Book of the Dead. Dover Publications.

The Three Initiates. The Kybalion. Yogi Publication Society, 1908.

Gospel of Thomas / Nag Hammadi Library. Trans. James Robinson. Harper, 1978.

Druidic and Pagan Traditions

Greer, John Michael. The Druid Path. Llewellyn, 2021.

Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Druid Way. Element Books, 1993.

Science and Consciousness

Braden, Gregg. The Divine Matrix. Hay House, 2007.

Sheldrake, Rupert. The Presence of the Past: Morphic Resonance. Park Street Press, 1988.

Watson, Lyall. Lifetide. Simon & Schuster, 1979.

van der Kolk, Bessel. The Body Keeps the Score. Viking, 2014.

Chevalier, Gaetan et al. Earthing: Health Implications. NIH PMC3265077. 2012.

Energy Healing and Self-Love

Dale, Cyndi. Advanced Chakra Healing. Crossing Press (read ~2007).

Orozco, Geraldine. Self Love Sundays series. YouTube / iqproductionz.com.

Carter, Jasmine Alicia. Sacred Woman. sacredwoman.com.

Sound and Reclamation

Jenny, Hans. Cymatics. Macromedia, 2001.

Hill, Lauryn. "Everything Is Everything." The Miseducation of Lauryn Hill. Ruffhouse/Columbia, 1998.

Quote Investigator. "Be the Change You Wish to See in the World." quoteinvestigator.com, 2017. (Origin of the popularized phrase, Arleen Lorrance, 1974.)

Haligricity.IQProductionz.com. "Why Haligricity Exists." 2026.

You Are the Current. • Be More You. • Ashe'.