"In your soul lies the entry way to real magic.

To enter the realm of real magic you will have to suspend all thoughts of limitation and become a spiritual being first, a being who has no limitation in your inner domain.

Acting as if you already were what you want to become and knowing that you can become it, is the way to remove self-doubt and enter your real magic kingdom."

-Dr. Wayne Dyer

Introduction

When first introduced to my concepts of life and thinking, you may find ruptured defensive tyrant activity within your inner voices; thus creating the feeling of disbelief. Remembering that the true ruler is our feeling, (the emotions or "energy in motion") whatever you believe is manifesting. Without an open mind, you may never experience real magic. However, real magic is taking place all over the world. Society uses images and words to stir feelings inside each person who witnesses their projections and many times we act on these feelings. We are so vulnerable to our words, (and environments effecting our thoughts, to our feelings, to our actions) we project our inner selves onto the world (with our perceptions through our words and actions –affecting others to do the same.) It's a "ripple effect" and the world is our canvas. Without consciously deciding what picture we want to create, the "spelling" all around us is dictating our essence and creating someone else's reality. The more people who can strengthen their awareness to the vulnerability around our very nature to be "spell-bound," the stronger our true inner yearnings can be loved and cherished.

Chapter I

Where Is It Formed?

In learning to take control of our lives, we must understand that we create our universe. All the support we need is within ourselves. Many believe there is a source for the never-ending energy or "life-force" within us. Our power is what we make it; our power is our belief. If it enhances our power to say we have the "universe" or "God" backing us up, use that belief as strength. Ultimately, since "we are the only thinker in our minds," the voices or feelings we get when communicating with deities stem from our perceptions. Shakti Gawain says, that we are all channels for the universal energy to work through our forms. She talks about this cosmic web as a symphony orchestra where in order for us to create harmony, we must be true to our uniqueness. Louise Hay makes it clear with, "We always have a choice." Unfairly, we may not be aware of our choices due to acute programming. Since our worlds are a reflection of ourselves, and quite similarly, the universe also works for us, we are always in charge. One way we can start to open up our view, is by asking yourself to be open and receptive. We can do this in affirmation form by affirming, "I am open and receptive." –or whatever affirmation resonates with you. As I mentioned some of us find power in "light workers." Maybe you remember, (like Doreen Virtue says) in order for the "angels" to help us, we must ask for them to intervene.

An experience I am going through now is because I asked for that help. Recently, I remembered that shortly before this impactful event, I was writing to the angels asking for their assistance. If I had only remembered my asking at the time of the event, I may have made better choices to support their direction. Instead, I created a catastrophe of events for I was blind to the real issue that had always been inside myself. The truth of the matter was, that I was denying my true feelings; so, through the events that occurred rapidly after I directly asked for help, I was shown my reflection veiled from my understanding. In retrospect, I can see now, that even in the beginning of this dramatic life change, I was shown "red-flags" and I chose to ignore them. In the following chapters I'll expand on identifying "red-flags" using other terms.

In most my realizations, the subtlest things (commonly overlooked) hold the most value. In this case, many of us forget, even though an individual holds the weight of creating one's reality, we are always working in a web of interconnectedness –some people call this "collected consciousness." At times, we can create the feelings inside (stemmed from our conditioned perceptions) having us think there is "no way out." However, I must repeat, like Louise Hay says, "We always have a choice," and "We are the only thinker in our minds." What I am getting at (regardless of my point) is, we can make the changes in our environment to support our intentions. This means, that if we surround and/or infuse ourselves with "negative energy," recognizing the drain, building up our belief in possibilities, and taking action steps to alleviate this condition is our aptitude –and my point is, "we" create our reality. Surrounding ourselves with "co-creators" will ultimately enhance our productivity –because when we are surrounded by repetitious negativity, it's only accustom that we absorb it. If we are able to remove negativity from our lives and it keeps showing up, it may be something to look at more closely because "our inner reflects our outer" –"we are in control." Toni Carmine Salerno says,

"You do not have to run away from the world in order to find peace, for the true peace is inside you. It is through our own relationships with others that we learn more about our own character. From a higher perspective, everyone we encounter is a reflection of ourselves, and the universe has placed around us things that will help us expand our love and tolerance. We meet people we like and people we dislike. When we see what we consider to be positive traits in others, we align with these characteristics because we believe them to be good, Yet, when we see what we consider to be negative aspects in others' characters, we refuse to see those same traits in ourselves because we judge them as bad. Yet the truth is that we have each trait within us, either currently or in the past, otherwise we would not be able to recognise those traits in another."

Aspects of ourselves may be calling to us to master them in order to feel peace and let go of our nitpicking quirks.

Chapter II

The Truth

The first way we can begin to create our surroundings is by being true to ourselves. When I was first introduced to the term "true to yourself," I wondered what that meant. I questioned that, if I lied to someone, was I lying to myself? My insight was that, it depended on the very nature of the lie and that the most important lies were subtlest. An important lie is one that you say because you think it is going to help someone else feel good –in other terms, "being nice". The other type of lies, are ones that don't directly affect others and you believe they benefit you –some people call them "white" lies. The most important lies are ones that have both definitions included. Trickiest of all, are lies that we actually believe.

What needs to be heeded is when we lie to make others feel good. This is the hugest way we lie to ourselves. Not only do we have another person tricked, (under a spell; controlled) they are now helping to create a reality that does not coexist with what we truly want (backstabbing ourselves!) The other person suffers because they are lead on, and you "suffer" by living in two different realities (at times, becoming trapped; screaming inside!) Although the truth eventually becomes revealed, everyone would benefit if we were honest from the beginning. Sometimes we are fooled to think lies will help, or that they will hold off situations from occurring until we feel we can support the truth. Lying is always risky business and can create anxiety (which doesn't help creating what we want.) No matter what "type" of lies we tell and whether we are "caught" –or not, everyone is effected. It is said that when we stop "lying to ourselves," others stop lying to us. Where does your lying balance lie?

On a more personal note, being true to ourselves involves making commitments to the things that matter to us. It is instinctive for some of us to put others needs before our own. More often, we put a lot of weight on the opinions of others. Sometimes this is so first-hand, we actually think their needs and thoughts are ours to tend to! (An infant is definitely an exception! However, over time our goal as parents is to guide our children to be self-sufficient.) Civilization uses this trigger as a means to keep its function. When we feel needed, we feel obligated and important –but what is our true inner voice saying amongst the frontal chatter? Learning how to tune-out others opinions, perspectives and recommendations is a helpful tool to establish knowing who you are. This is your life and your experiences. Your choices are only for you to decide. It is not that we purposely ignore our inner yearnings, but that we have not been able to separate them from outside influences. In fact, most of us always habitually look outside of ourselves for validation that what we are doing is right. Sadly, this is how we were raised. Some children enjoy how much energy/currency is created from doing the wrong thing. As we get older sometimes we grow out of the attention-seeking behavior and do what we need to have things run smoothly.

It's a difficult custom to redesign into a first-hand response of going with your intuition. Somehow, logic always sneaks in to redirect us or even fool us that logic is logic –and sometimes it may not be an outside influence at all, but you. For instance, last night I was walking to a store that my memory was saying the number of the address was in the one hundreds; when I saw that the numbers were going up at two hundred, I turned my direction around. My intuition was saying that all the shops were in the other direction and the way I was walking looked fairly "dead," turning into residential addresses. When I asked a stranger to "validate" the address of the shop for me using their smart phone, they told me it was in the four hundreds! To help determine logic from intuition using the example above –My logic was actually an illusion that turned me in the opposite direction. When I went outside of myself for validation, I know now, if I tuned-in, I already knew the answer. I may not have remembered the exact address, but I did know what direction would ultimately lead me to where I wanted to go. Judging my experience last night, I know what state of mind I was in and honestly, I was a bit frantic. I had some anxiety and I was not relaxed. I look at this experience as a building block to understand that sometimes I just need to relax; sometimes I can fool myself.

Some use outside influence as a strength to provide for themselves. Why is it easier to cook and clean for guests than it is to do for us alone? We have got to make ourselves just as important as anyone else! Some use selfishness as an avoided term leading them to always taking care of others before themselves –they don't want to be selfish. In a parenting class I took, one of our mottos was "We can only take care of our children as well as we can take care of ourselves." Some members would argue on the topic of their parents starving themselves to feed them. Maybe this is an unhealthy mechanism we have adapted. If our parents did not eat, they may die and then who will feed us? Parents are needed to regulate children's emotions and set examples. When parents use the motto "do as I say not as I do," this gives kids mixed messages and unconsciously they may default to their parent's behaviors when they are faced with the same stressors as adults. What we need to do now is make our behaviors acceptable to ourselves. When we feel guilty about our actions that means we are not being true to us. Children can be great teachers in this because we become more sensitive to the behaviors we actually dislike about ourselves. It is not selfish to care for our own-self first. In fact, everything flows smother and quicker.

There's a difference between "going with the flow" and doing things because it's just ethical. For instance; One day I found my own support in going to the grocery store. In being "thoughtful," I decided to ask my neighbor if he wanted me to pick anything up for him. I did this to "be nice" because he always bashed me in being selfish and he did things for me now-and-then. His "spelling" stirred energy in me that was fear-based. Due to my fear or "screaming objective voice inside," I brought him back all the items he requested. Looking at my actions objectively, I did not need to do anything for him. In letting my emotions be "spell-bound," and probably somewhere inside thinking I shouldn't do this for him, when I returned with his items, he "danced around" calling me dumb. Somewhere, there was miscommunication in the exactness of one item I brought back. I got the right brand, but he wanted chicken nuggets and not fillets! He returned them at the store right afterwards. This also made me feel worthless. My analogy is, I created that situation to learn how to better respect myself. I thought I was finally doing something "right." [The only way one can truly be "thoughtful," is to think through all the possible outcomes of a generous situation before "setting ourselves up" for disappointment.] In knowing we can never truly prepare our minds for all the possible outcomes, I have found that meditating on one without becoming too attached to it can be beneficial. The saying "For the greatest and highest good" is used after making an intention because something better than you have expected can come your way –but if you are too fixed on how you set your mind on events to unfold, you could be blinded from the better opportunity at hand no matter how bad circumstances may appear at the beginning of their growth. As long as you put out a positive intention and are true to how you feel about it, your feelings (your truth) will prevail.

As with most things, going with the flow can be negative and positive. How to tune into what the "right" flow is, dictates its nature. The "red flags" I mentioned earlier have to do with our feelings. The truth is, our rational mind can disguise any action as justifiable or malapropos –and society has contributed to our lack of self-trust with its rules. Even stopping at a red light when no cars are around –what if the light was green but cars were coming in the opposite direction? Now all of a sudden we need to use our own judgment? Nothing is "bullet proof" –except how we truly feel. We have been conditioned to look outside of ourselves for direction and approval.

Using what some call "intuition" or our "inner knowing," is our true guidance. Since we have been dulled to its vibrancy, it takes practice to recognize what this feels like to us. Doreen Virtue Ph.D. describes it as a "tightening in the stomach." In my experience, I use subtle details in others body language and words (this creates a vibe for me to decide "which way to go.") This makes up my perspective and judgment leaving a "feeling" inside. Many argue that judgment is "bad," they want people to be open. While vulnerability can be healthy in certain situations, I say, there's a difference between judging by stereotyping and judging by our experiences. We don't need much experience to determine weather the so-called "stereotype" is true or not. The fact we have stereotypes is a foretelling format in itself because it gives us the apparent opportunity to analyze. Reaching back to expressing how our environment impacts our reality, the rarity that stereotypes don't hold true, has to do with the stereotyped individual's self-growth. If we take an individual out of its "group" and place them in another circumstance, that's their true test. Some people are like chameleons, changing rapidly to blend in. Depending on the nature of their expansion, they may be gathering aspects of themselves. Fundamentally, using and judging our feelings as "stop" or "go" instructions constitutes self-respect.

Our logic mind will argue that if something did not work out and we were rejected, it was not supposed to happen. As with many areas of our life, we need moderation/balance because (in this situation) we also do not want to over work ourselves either. Mary Kay talks of, "failing forward." From our experiences we can also learn to take healthy steps toward our dreams. Stepping out of our "comfort zone" will always keep us growing (which I believe to be part of everyone's life purpose!) One motto all over the world is "never give up." In all honesty, in real awareness, there is righteousness in giving up. Many people give up out of low self-esteem, selfishness, protection and so forth. This type of rejection is not righteous. I must highlight the caution in alternating logic and premonition. The logic mind is always "bickering" with rules or excuses. We have been taught to give people chances, but here's an example for you– One time I had a court appointed lawyer who I tried contacting before my court date and received no answer or reply. My feeling about this was that I did not want her representation because she obviously did not have the time for me. To back-up my feelings, I wrote my own legal agreement for her to sign to comply with my request. Upon presenting this to her, she explained I needed her to follow the courts rules and order. Feeling as though she was smarter than me "in the court of law," I forfeited my intentions and went with her logic. In continuing our relationship, I continued becoming disappointed because she was not on top of my stuff. The last straw was when my partner's lawyer emailed me the court results a week before my lawyer even got to it! Doreen Virtue puts it together nicely in explaining that as "nice people" we tend to give into a potential (logic) and tune-out our initial judgments. This leaves room for chance and change in capabilities, but this accustomed apparatus is an unhealthy risk when our happiness stems from our ability to honor ourselves.

No matter what choices we make, we still can only blame ourselves for deciding what notions to follow. We can find comfort in this when we can relax knowing we can take care of our self. Before making decisions, think about if only you can handle whatever it is –that way you are prepared for any outcome. Being thoughtful about our range and needs, combats spontaneous actions of others interfering with our desires. My example is, I have to eat snacks if my partner and I are going to cook together. He takes his time cooking and I cook when I am hungry. I may become irritable when I am hungry because my basic needs are not met –so for things to flow smoothly, I need to make sure I take care of myself first.

A favorable attendant to advance in interpreting yourself can be known as "quiet time." Quiet time can be done while being still or active. Some people may find noisy atmospheres to be comforting and others may find silent solitude to be alleviating. Whether sitting or walking, laying or exercising, you have got to find your individual technique for reflection and make it a "date" with yourself. This remedy bestows the capacity that could stay lethargically concealed if unexplored. If you are a stranger to quiet time try practicing in five minute intervals where you turn your phone on silent and give yourself space to attract new ideas, work through emotions or focus on preparation for desired results. When I take my quiet time, I may not plan to do anything specific, and go where my mind takes me –trusting my inner guidance will conjure up what needs my attention most at that given time. This may be an effective method when it comes to working through emotions, sparking insight and gathering motivational action steps. When it comes to focus, we may actually need to consciously choose and plan. Preparation components may include the "what ifs" we have tended to stray from. Ralph Smart says that although what you focus on grows, what you don't focus on grows even larger! Thinking about what "could" happen can help you prepare your responses instead of un-thought-out reactions that do not align with your goal. This also helps us be open and not fixed on our desired result.

When we trust ourselves, we have got to know our desire is flourishing and so, we must confidently handle situations that may conflict with that by understanding "things are not always as they seem." However, that is a "fine line" reverting back my mention of avoiding lying to ourselves –which I will help clear up in a later chapter. When we are faced with the outcome we are not expecting, pause. Noticing that anxiety may be rising, take a few deep breaths and try to relax. No matter how frustrating it may be not to "jump," I have found that it is okay to let go. The times I have reacted instantly, I have found (when my mind calmed) either things were not how I perceived, or I was making moves that did not resonate with my desires (I was in my ego.) Many people talk about the fact that no one can take away our power unless we allow them to. Although acutely accurate, to further stabilize, each continuance avails our competence to contest our habits of emotional reaction and value importance.

Chapter III

Awareness

A great concept proposed by Harold W. Percival is the focus upon distinguishing the parts of oneself. Although the mind has many parts and labels, identifying its separateness from the body is prime. Harold conveys mind as "the thinker," spirit as "the personality," and body as "the vessel." It seems the "trinity" is present in volumes of concepts. When I was in high school, I wrote a rap that included, "What you say, think and do are three different things, and they need to be the same, and they need to be the same. Don't let them sway freely and change, but think deeply rearrange. Don't play yourself. You a'n't a game." This is a chief abstraction to review in regards to your truth. However, what I did not add to my rap to make the "trinity" a "tetralty," (see definition on page X) is what we feel. Feeling is different from fact but the relationship to the trinity involving the metamorphosis from feeling to thinking to doing (which may involve speaking) can be altered for the better by obtaining the most clear and concrete facts we can before allowing ourselves to begin transforming. Examining the stages of our "reality metamorphosis" is essential to maintain their unity or dysfunctions will unfold due to our universal laws. I think the main goal of the universe is harmony, so when that "higher order" sees the discord between our stages of reality, it tries its best to convey them to us using reality –so that we can make the necessary internal and or external changes needed, to work in unity with "the greatest, highest good."

Yin Yang

Harold says there's a difference between feeling and desire, that women are driven by feeling and men desire. He also mentions how "feeling" is not a factual scientifically based sense because the only unit to perceive that sense is the body –not a distinct instrument such as eyes, ears nose or mouth. Harold also relays that feeling and desire work collectively (male and female have each.) I say desire comes from the mind thinking about what the body can feel. Whereas feeling first, relates to desire by having a feeling in the body followed by thinking of the desire. Whichever sequence, each leads us to pursue and create. As with any sense, it comes down to individuality for perception and or preference.

Even though most women are feeling-driven, men and women take the same amount of time (when focused on such) to control emotions. In fact, neither is better than the other or easier to counteract. Each sex battles the back and forth between their thoughts and feelings. Women feel, let go (act,) then think, then feel, let go, and think (the cycle goes on,) men the opposite by thinking, feeling, then letting go (acting.) The fact for both sexes is, that once we are in the feeling mode; we tend to "loose control" and potentially act impulsively. Men can try to override their feelings by making their thoughts more powerful (since typically they use their mind first.) What men understand is that if their thinking is strong, they do not need to feel their feelings and that is where the unhealthy balance begins (by hiding them.) Each sex will always feel. The difference is, after a woman feels, she can attempt to use her thinking to hide emotions to try to keep from feeling more. Each struggle is absolutely unhealthy because we are not being honest and expressing our truth –and it doesn't even work (because we still feel either way!) However, this is why men seem to be stronger and women weaker emotionally.

A reason why it is stereotypical that women like drama is because drama is all feeling-based. Women may feel jealousy, act, and then think about their actions. Men may think, "I don't want this guy to take my girl, then they feel, and act. It may be harder for men to apologize because they may not think about their actions after they act, but have a new thought instead (and start a new cycle.) Since a woman's cycle involves thinking in her first "trinity," she can easily think about her actions right away. This is why it is challenging to understand each other. Each sex wants instant gratification in different areas. Men want women to think when women are feeling and women to act when the man is feeling. Although women want the same, we are always in a different mode of the trinity than the other. This is also what makes us attracted to one another. Think about it, women find men attractive when they are thinking and men find women attractive when they are acting. Likewise, this is reversely authentic. To explain further if a woman is talking (which is acting) a man may zone out in his feeling mode. When a man is quiet (thinking) a woman feels and wants his attention. This is the yin yang concept of opposites attract. Although we may have trouble understanding where each of us is in our cycles, we are constantly balancing our energies when we interact.

Each sex needs to respect the other by giving them enough time to process their individual "reality metamorphosis." Additionally, everyone processes this trinity at his or her own pace (depending on their ability to focus.) Men: think, feel, act. Women: feel, act, think. That's also why men can manipulate women easier or "first." Each cycle is almost the same when repeated, but still very different. Our similarities are that each sex is "feeling" before they act. However our natures were created, we can never solely think before we act as we are instructed by clichés. This was an attempt to balance our actions. Working hard with awareness and taking control of our feelings by thinking about them again (pushing for that trinity to be a tetralty) before acting is a good idea to work on and also a battle. Resorting back to "our truths."

The focus here for both sexes is in thought because ultimately we both think. Regardless on the pattern in which we think and feel, our power is in thought. Learning how to manage our thoughts is the only key to controlling our emotions. Remember, Harold made it clear that the body is not a distinct instrument, that it is only a vessel. The only thing that allows our body to have life is our mind. Even when a person is hospitalized in a way that they cannot use their spirit/personality, when their brain is still active, they are considered alive and their body functions. Although listening to the signals our body provides can help us care for our body, our mind is in the control seat. Prospectively, along with Harold's outlook on senses, he notes that it is not the ears that classify what they hear. Like all of our senses, they are what our minds tell us. It is our amenability to be authoritative with our apperceptions.

Thinking Closer

We must believe in the power of "intention." Everything begins with a single thought. Whether we decide the thought is goal for us or not, it is still a seed. (Louise Hay speaks of thoughts as being our children.) Watering "seeds" helps them grow, right? Some "fertilizers" include affirmations and visualizations. These fertilizers can be used in negative and positive ways. Complaining is an example of negative affirmations. Our thoughts can be words or images; so sometimes, we can "think the worst and expect the best." This is contrasting and ineffective without a strong focal point. They say, for every one negative thought, we would need to think ten positive thoughts to create balance. This concludes, that negativity carries a lot of weight. Think about this, when you decide to feel depressed, don't you feel a heavy feeling (like you just don't want to move) and sometimes we catch ourselves "curled up in a ball?" Another example, is when we do get ourselves into a negative emotional state, usually, it takes much longer to regain our "happiness" than it takes us to "slip" into negativity. Some could articulate, that it's our brain chemistry that causes this. As "animals," we have a natural "defense mechanism." How one's mechanism may react, depends on their perspective and processing speed. The fact we want to be "labeled" "humans," means we have the capacity to shift unconscious "reactions" to, conscious responses. Understanding our nature makes this possible –by becoming aware.

Mind Tricks

The tyrant mind will advise you what it thinks is logical given what it can see from your outside world –or what it thinks is "right." However, (as I've mentioned) inside is where the infinity of possibilities exist –and the truth. Letting your tyrant talk, but not binding to it's "spelling," is an essential part to master your self-respect. Convolutedly, your ego also voices opinions in your mind that are more rebelic. One of the most common ego "tactics" is "cutting off your nose to spite your face." That's the saying my mom used with me when I was a girl. It means that you are making decisions that you do not really like in attempts to hurt another person because you felt they hurt you. This kismetic activity is not something we should be responsible for. It circles back to, "What you give out comes back to you." Most importantly, everything is only perspective; so whether you think a person did something on purpose to hurt you or not, it's only a perception –unless the person admits to it. If someone did do something on purpose to hurt you, it may have only been because they perceived that something you did, hurt them. Continuing this cycle does not get us anywhere! It is inevitable, changes begin with recognition. Despairingly, awareness alone, does not retrieve our end goals. With intention/belief, drive, and techniques, infinite attainability advances.

Auto-Response

When "true wisdom stands the test of time," never over-night we are to truly realize how to understand the expansion in respecting ourselves. Not only is society using us as tools, we all have our own "mind molds" that dictate our responses. It is natural (based on the science measured about how our brains work) that we are unconsciously reaching into our memory banks in every situation we face. We are responding from our subconscious as our brains make connections to similarities we may never remember from events that began in our childhood or from events we can remember –if we choose to analyze our response patterns. We can help ourselves begin to understand ourselves in this way is by journaling our days. The best way to organize this (after you have written for a month for example) is to cut out paragraphs from highlighted reactions/responses and categorize them. Maybe one category would be, "heated conversations." Using another notebook, you can paste all your situations relating to that category to analyze. If you have been having similar responses, actively choose different ones. Contrarily, if you have been responding differently, analyze which outcomes you enjoyed –then decide to consciously make the responses that have brought you the most fulfillment and work on strengthening those. After a month, you may have discovered areas you want to work on; going forward, you could dedicate your writing to those situations and skip on the lengthy entries of your whole days.

Chapter IV

Labels

Understanding how to stop letting, "spelling," or words, create the energy within us, is an awareness that can provide protection from outer influences and also, a favored strength to becoming a warrior of your emotions. Not responding to words –especially ones that are not even our own, is a powerful step in combating the matrix around us. Intertwiningly, changing our beliefs about words can separate our emotions attached to them.

Let's just say you are in a relationship that you feel trapped in. This person is calling you names that you do not like. You could work around this by associating those words with fabulous meanings. Making collages can help enhance your "re-programming" by using the imagery. Say this person is calling you "worthless," try pairing that word with hundreds of hundred dollar bills. After focusing on this association and meditating on your new idea, you may laugh (in your mind at least) when that person is calling you "worthless" because you know what it means to you. You may think, "I'm worthless? I know what worthless is, that's hundreds of hundred-dollar bills and that's a complement, thanks!" The most important thing in life is always you because you need you to experience anything else you deem important.

A tactic I used to use myself when "cutting of my nose to spite my face" was when I called myself "stupid" out loud to another person (looking for sympathy,) I would repeat in my head over and over "I'm smart, I'm smart, I'm smart." Using this approach when you hear yourself or others say things you disagree with allows you to separate your mind from negativity. It also allows that other voice or person (creating a negative voice in your mind) a chance to be with his or her own judgments. We cannot rush a person who is not ready to see things our way, when they believe themselves fully enough to externalize their thoughts using words (action, the last step in "reality metamorphosis.") Basically they are completing a process in their internalization by externalizing. Next, it will take time after the "exhaust" to level back down to the "feeling" or "thinking" mode to process their reality. Less stress for you to try and prove yourself to someone else who will continue to have that perspective anyway until they see different actions. The best thing for us to do is work on ourselves, and give others space, not our defenses. This means acknowledging other's perspectives and explaining ours when we are fully confident the other person/people have consciously received our acknowledgement. When sure the atmosphere is calm and we are calm, expressing our perspectives can be helpful if we can find the right language to support touchy subjects.

If something you, or others say toward you does not feel good, work on building up your confidence and making decisions that counteract that judgment. Remember not to look for others to approve your changes. If you can see your progress, only your opinion matters. Others perceptions can be taken into consideration, but if they are looking to see the changes you made, they will see them. Another part to our thinking is that we find what we look for.

Just because you can build up your confidence, does not mean it is okay to use it to put others down. This inner strength is to help you feel positive and use that positivity to create your desires. I have mentioned the world being a reflection of us and like Louise Hay says, "What you give out comes back to you." It is one of the basic rules in life.

Question Deeper

In our language, extended from timeless generations, we conditionally use idioms –sometimes, without even understanding their representations or history. As with societies projections, our personal external and internal language affects our energy. Learning to be aware and listen to these voices will open us up to "digging deeper." If we want to be positive, analyzing our dialogs and pondering ways to rephrase statements, or asking ourselves why we are thinking what we thinking, will begin the shift to take us there.

For instance, something happens where in your mind you are saying, "She's a bitch." Finding out why you are thinking this can help you to express your feelings more constructively instead of internalizing. Internalizing only causes stress and further "mind bickering" that is unnecessary when addressed properly.

"Excuse me," you may say, "I felt ignored and invisible when you cut me in line. You know, I do need to be somewhere and I was here before you. Do you mind if you checkout after me please?"

Not only are you respecting yourself, you will also help the other person by expressing your perspective because others may end up having the same thoughts about this person too. When doing so, the way the person responds should not affect you further; for if they are not open to your perspective, or you have used the "wrong" (from their comprehension) "spelling," (words) then they are not ready to grow or receive this as guidance. Just know, you have served your purpose and now, that is one less situation you need to hold inside of you.

If the example comes from a judgment and your internal dialog says, "She's stuck-up," you may decide to think logically about this and say, "I don't even know her, nor have I ever even spoken to this lady." Deciding to change your thoughts about others and yourself is a good idea. Changing our "word" thoughts is a healthy start. Maybe picking a whole different internal statement to say about "this lady" can work, like, "She's beautiful." Doesn't that just feel better?

Turning negative "affirmations" to positive ones and tuning into the peace associated with using positive words is a form of daily conscious meditation. When you feel the rush of emotion that is contrary of positive, and decide to take a deep breath, it is close to the same concept. This is also a form of grounding –no matter how "whimsical" it may feel if you are a beginner. Try focusing on that clinkered feeling until you can relax into the feeling of the new positive words you are saying. Change can always feel uncomfortable at first, but the only consistent thing in life is change. If when you look in the mirror you say, "Look at this fat body," you have got to do a lot of "work" before you can accept yourself saying, "Look at this beautiful body" –with love and appreciation.

Regardless of what you see in the physical, the magic in life is mastering the understanding that, "It's all about the vibe," as Clifford Davis would say in his advertisements promoting his music. If you can accept the physical as a "feel good" energy, then what you think about, will come about.

If when you look at your body and feel what you say as disgusting because of what you see, try working outside of yourself first. I say, "There's always a distinct path that can only be discovered by the walker." In other words, just because I talk about change needing to start with you, there are ways to use our "outer reflections" to derive ourselves back to the cause (us.) In this instance, try looking at other women or men who may be perceived to be "fat" and calling them beautiful (in your mind or to them personally, in public or in magazines.) Shifting your belief about beauty can develop in this way because "fat" is only an idea and it has been fastened in most of society that "fat" is "ugly." This is what "society" wants us to believe, (which is a thought I can change by looking at it as society is unaware that our collected judgments are unhealthy) we, are free, again, "We are the ONLY thinkers in our minds!" Let's elicit love in our perspectives and let go of the conditioned stress!

Grouping

When our world can truly understand everything is individuality, we can support our needs with the most respect. Everywhere we seem to go, we are constantly being judged (which makes us feel like we need to squeeze into molds created by everyone else's individual perceptions of what is deemed acceptable in society.) I feel like since there are so many of us, it's easier for people to put us in categories and make decisions based on a group. The problem with this set-up is that, not only do we feel we, "have to" be a certain way or something is, "wrong" with us, it is almost as if no one is getting a fair chance.

It is almost as if society has been looking to answer the "whys" in the world for so long, they make up "filler fables" as placeholders until someone may actually be able to factually "prove" something. If things are never proven, the "fable" will remain as the dependent and help "society" "feel" "safe." Either way, "proven" or "fable," each concept is only an idea. Whoever is conducting experiments still holds a personal perspective that may not be identified the same by everyone. This is especially true when researchers are "looking" for the results they want to see. I have found that there are many reasons why we only get one-sided stories and since they may not be on our "to do list" to look up, we just believe it.

One reason may be the money that is used to have us controlled in many ways. (From my perspective, I have experienced "money" being the reason or excuse many people use to dictate their reality because they stay in their logic mind.) In researching marijuana use during pregnancy, I found that there has been significant research done where experiments find there are positive effects on children such as increased IQ. The experiment I watched revealed that they were unable to continue researching further development of the children because they needed more money. This may have been where I heard that the researchers having the "money," dismissed any evidence that proved contrary to their position. To sync, this goes along with my presentation of how "we create our reality." We choose what to see and what to dismiss, always.

New Language

A fun creative way to use "spelling" is breaking down words. We have been taught it is polite to say, "Bless you," when a person sneezes. I believe this originated from people thinking we were sneezing out the devil. When I break down the phrase "B-less you," I can decide, I do not like this spelling. I could think people who sneeze are loosing a part of themselves and people are assuring them to "be less" of who they are! Questioning why we even used that term when we do not sneeze, can raise my awareness. Think about when people say, "Bless you," in other situations. What comes to my mind is someone on their knees and the person saying it is standing above them maybe touching their shoulder. To counteract this conditioned phrase, I could choose to say, "Be more you," and begin raising people's confidence! Whatever you choose, know it is okay to be "different" and a pioneer for making our world a better place "step by step." Being different takes confidence, but so does standing up for and respecting ourselves. Practice may not make perfect, but it sure strengthens our comfort around using our efforts and therefore, helps us move forward.

Making up our own sayings and new words is a safe thing to do. We may need to explain ourselves, so maybe developing a personal dictionary could be a choice. I am the type of person who is "not a fan" of repeating myself, so the dictionary is definitely a tool I am developing for my personal "spelling." In fact, I have included a dictionary in the back of this book for the new words I have used in this book (see page 80.) That way, if you question the authenticity of a word, I am sure you can find it there!

Chapter V

Currency

Since money is the general conscious current that barricades or animates our civilization, it is basic that we deduce a philosophy that exempts us from its containment. I believe society has maintained money's function to keep civil order. This began in ancient times with trading. Whether goods for goods, or services for services, or something in between, some type of exchange has been used that is somewhat tangible. Behavior converted from this concept has made people feel like they need to repay other people for their kindness or harshness. People's perceptional judgments upon others are not righteous (when it comes to payback) and not a responsibility we should adapt. When we focus on ourselves, not only are we able to release these kinds of weights, the more light and free we become and the easier it is to uphold our individual currency.

I have decided that I am going to make this book donation-based from a non-profit organization. In the past I was all about doubling my money for products I made. The problem was, I forgot about my true purpose. So focused on making a living with my talents, I focused on making myself worthy of receiving good pay for my products/services. Looking at things differently now, what matters most to me is my message and spreading it. Reality is, I am not going to survive off of selling a book or a CD for ten dollars. However, if I can share, and give my talents from my heart, I leave it up to the universe to see my good. Not putting a price on my talents is much more respectful and appreciated than limiting and expecting. That way I can give more and the more people who know about me, the better chances I have for people just wanting to give because they see what I am doing.

Stuff

"Everything is energy interacting with energy," probably Ralph Smart said that, but it's true. Every thing in our physical world holds energy. When we have piles of old things lying around, they represent old energy. Many people hold on to things for sentimental reasons, but a lot of us hold on to things out of "scarcity thinking" as well. Some suggest moving their furniture around often or trying to take a different way to work to "shake things up." We have got to do something to help us create new experiences! Action using physical things can really show the universe you mean business. I have heard stories including people not knowing how they would accomplish things, but did what they could to make a difference in their energy and the rest just followed "magically." One lady insisted on moving and packed up her house in boxes when she had no place to go. By manipulating what we can of the energy available to us, we can always act in the now for our desires.

Breathing

Ilchi Lee emphasizes the eminence of breathing in his book Human Technology. Neglectful that our respiratory system breathes for us robotically, many of us fail to breathe consciously. If we take the time to breathe consciously on a daily basis, we can start to re-program our breathing. Breathing is what keeps us alive and we can start a full breath by breathing out fully first. It is almost like a life principle. Shakti Gawain and Wayne Dyer talked about the power in giving away. Releasing in general creates the "vacuum effect," where balance is maintained. When focusing on an out-breath and squeezing all the air out of you, it is automatic that you take a nice, deep breath in. The same goes for donating things you do not use. I believe it was Louise Hay who said, "If you haven't used it in over a year, it's time to move on." Let's not make this statement be true for our breathing!

It is said that breathing regenerates us, brining in positivity and releasing negativity. Harold Percival writes that using both nostrils is a neutral breath where the right is negative and left is positive.
Ilchi Lee writes about four stages of breathing, stomach breathing, chest breathing, shoulder breathing and the shallowest, neck breathing! The deepest and most efficient is stomach breathing.
My basic principle throughout this book is that, what we picture in our minds and feel with our hearts, we can make real. My idea about breath is in containing three main chambers. A stomach breath keeps us grounded and relaxed. In chest breathing there may be anxiety and neck breathing fear. I breathe through all chambers consciously to clear them and circulate the energy. In starting with my stomach, I circle breath through each chamber and create an elliptical movement with in and out breaths.

Yoga can teach us to put one hand on our stomach and one on our heart. Just feel what your breath does and then consciously direct it to fill your stomach first, then your chest shoulders and neck (like a wave.) Yoga can challenge us to then breath out oppositely. Ilchi Lee talks about the energy current in the body being cold rising up our backs over our head and warm moving down our chests. This view can be implemented into our conscious breathing. Yoga teaches many different kinds of breathing that involve holding different sides of the nostrils and counting before breaths (known as Paranyama breathing, which can stimulate higher realms of our minds.)

I think practicing any type of "conscious" breathing is beneficial. In being creative and trusting your own energy flow, you could make up your own way of breathing that suits you best. Ilchi asks readers to think of how they breathe when experiencing different emotions. "In with the new, out with the old," we release negativity and energize our bodies with positive fresh air every time we breathe. Even though we can't always see our breath, it is always energy. Breath is so basic, a primary nutrition for our form; it's a good place to focus on at anytime we can remember. Ilchi informs us that in our breath alone, we can make tremendous affects with our health. If you would like to implement breathing to assist your overall health and currency, you can begin with a minimum of fifteen minutes each day breathing consciously in any way you like. This could be as simple as just being aware of your breathing for your dedicated length of time.

Chakras

One of the first spiritual things I learned about was about our chakras; my mother actually taught me how to clean them. As I grew, I wanted to learn more and found out there are probably an infinite amount of chakras. All we have to do to create them is visualize their presence and meaning and work with them. I personally can't physically see auras or chakras, but that doesn't stop me from working with them. Of what I found documented when I was deeply into chakras, (the energy centers of the body) was that there are thirty-six. Most commonly worked with are our basic seven. They say they range from red to purple in rainbow sequence and the seventh at the crown of our heads is white or clear. I think it's important to sense what color your chakras are the best you can, they may be similar but could have their own defined shade –especially if neglected for quite some time. It may take extra long to clean them if you are just starting out.

How do you know how long it takes to clean each one? This is what I am talking about… It is a feeling you have got to tune in to– and trust! To get started, you can find guided meditations to help clean, balance and heal your basic chakras on YouTube.

Two of the most important chakras aside from our basic seven out of the thirty-six that I still work with are the chakra at the bottom of our feet and the ones on the palms of our feet and hands. Within the thirty-six there were also three located before our crown chakra aside from the widely known seven. The one at the base of our feet is a brown and green color. This is our root (not root chakra,) it stems to the center of the earth and helps to ground us. Focusing on this chakra pulling our energy into the red core of the earth is a good place to focus on anytime we can remember during our times of confusion.

The chakras located on our palms and soles are said to be a light pink color. We can send energy from these centers including our third eye. Before the crown chakra, there is an indigo colored chakra right on top of our heads (I believe our third-eye chakra is purple and that indigo is more blue in tone.) A few inches above our head is a silver chakra, above that a gold one and then, our crown chakra glows.

What I like to do in a chakra meditation is first picture them spinning counter-clockwise like disks and my spine is in their center. Some say that we have front and back chakras. In my practice, I focus on connecting them into one. Focusing with this counter-clockwise motion and with my hands and feet flat on the floor or surface, I drain my chakras. All their energy and color flows through my hands and feet and is directed into the earth to transform it. Once all my chakras are clear in color and their spinning still, I begin refilling them.

Many teachers start working chakra-by-chakra beginning from the root chakra or bottom and moving toward the head or crown; I also follow this pattern. In a chakra mediation lead by Doreen Virtue, she uses cleansing sea salt air by using the image of sea mist entering the body through the breath. This can be a beneficial cleansing mechanism along with Sarah Hall's imagery of breathing in sage. Widely used, is the image of white light to purify our energy. Breathing in white light is one way to imagine it entering our bodies; another way is to imagine it pouring from the heavens and entering through the top of our heads.

When refilling, I spin them clockwise. I picture real objects in nature that relate to their color and I soak up that energy into each one until they have a steady spin and feel full. I like to use objects that can really feed my imagination with wondrous colors related to each chakra. Starting at the base chakra (with red,) I may think of a perfect red apple and breathe in the color from my mind sending it into a clockwise swirling disk, basking, while feeling the energy expand. Depending on you, depends on how big you want your chakras to extend. As a limitless being, I extend them infinitely, around the world and into the universe.

When tuning in to your chakras, I say you are the true guide to deciding what colors each of your chakras really are. The most important thing to notice is if they are dull. Using the visuals in your mind that you can clearly picture can help to strengthen their color. Meditating on each chakra until your mind can faithfully see and feel the color is vibrant will help to strengthen your energy.

The other aspect about chakras is tuning into their vibration. Feeling the pace and steadiness of their movement is they key to balancing them. Finding a momentum that appeals to you is the fundamental principle.

After my chakra regeneration, I also tune into my aura. I clean its rainbowed layers just with my focus. You can visualize sage smoke or white light doing the clearing as well. Next, I expand my energy field. I picture all the invisible, computer-like networking and make collective connections further out on my grid. To complete, I use a concept given from Divine Mother. She suggests using a double-helix spiral of gold energy around you. One circle extends up and one extends down protecting you. Doreen suggests making a shield that lets in love but not negativity.

There are a lot of ways we can tune into our personal energy, from moving physical items, breathing, working with chakras and the next subjects to focus. The fact remains that we have currency and we can strengthen it the more we use these ideas.

Exercising

Exercising moves a lot of energy around and can transfer our negative energy into endorphins. When we boil water and it transfers to steam, the matter become light and clear. Always relate your body to water since we are made up of so much of it. Anytime we can heat up our bodies safely, we too become lighter and clear. Our whole vibration can be tuned to a higher frequency. It is also said that what we are we attract.

When we burn negative energy, it helps to calm us because Adrenaline is our response to stress. In stemming from our emotions, adrenaline is based in our body's ability to feel. When we transform adrenaline to endorphins, it strengthens our minds since endorphins react with the brain's opiate receptors. This is a healthy balance because when adrenaline can be used, we are not hiding our feelings and are acting them out constructively.

Adrenaline can be a toxin these days since society has rules around circumstances in order to "keep the peace." The rules of our government created "legal" ways to deal with shortcomings and if they can't fix it, we have got to let it go.

After exercising, our bodies automatically feel relaxed because we have taken care of our emotions in this way. This leaves us room to focus on our true thoughtful feelings and not overreact compulsively. From this sense of grounding, we can take our next steps.

Health

Our energy currency directly affects our health. Think about it, someone in good health is usually positive. Positive people have welcoming energy. Positivity is like peace; it is at ease, balanced in excitement (for too much excitement leads to anxiety.) It is not a person's health that makes them negative or positive, it is their underlying emotions. Of course balancing our "reality metamorphosis" is ideal and connected to our health because our health is yet another reflection of inside of us. A direct reflection of our tendencies to neglect self-care, results in our health. When we ignore our body's subtle indications for love and care, our bodies "scream louder." Sometimes our bodies can get so bad that we need to take medicine in order to numb our feelings and get back to focusing on our minds. Too much medication cannot only numb our feelings (body) but also our minds since they are part of our bodies. This is when "life" as we know it can deteriorate when the hope of regaining true consciousness is lost.

Many subjects of medicine feel manipulating our feelings allows our minds to heal by thinking it is healed. This Furthermore, for deeper illnesses, serious mental work needs to be done while on medication to actually heal –this includes surgery intervention. The trick is that medication/surgery tricks our minds into thinking we are healed and may not actually cure our underlying mental issue. This results in dependency to medication and or our doctors since it is easy for us not to do the work. Just looking at our individual objectives is a struggle for most without including how to "fix" them.

Harold Percival writes about certain illnesses being brought from life to life until we can mentally cure them. He mentions that in most cases cancer develops from repressing sexual desires, Louise Hay has a basic guideline of what certain illnesses represent mentally and includes affirmations to help alleviate them in her book You Can Heal Your Life. Harold and Louise Hay write about surgeries and other medicines fixing the most apparent diseases and that when we do not mentally cure them, they either develop again in the same way, or appear as a different illness or disease. What's important is that each negative and positive about us is something to be valued –in hopes that we can truly learn to love our whole being. This mental work may involve caring for the body better.

Due to the progression of civilization, most of us are "on the go." "Poor" and on the go is not the best unless we make the time to prepare enough meals to fuel us until we get back home. I am not one for thinking about how I am going to "feel" later. Since I am female, driven by feeling first, it takes more effort to "think" about feeling. It is much easier to go with the flow –except when I realize later my flow has a block! Running out of fuel, my body reminds me with a growling stomach, a headache, and then, negative, impatient, overwhelmed emotions that lead to negative thinking. This is not good self-care!

This is also why men and women can work well together; their minds and bodies are like perfect puzzle pieces. Since the man is driven by desire first, he can think about his desire for food later for himself. A woman's feeling for others causes her to think about them. Therefore, she would prepare meals for the family's day, but the strong feelings she has for others seems to not be as strong when only for herself. This is also why it seems like women are more dependent because they need a feeling to drive them. Each sex enjoys the support the other and brings them closer to their "reality metamorphosis."

Weather individual or paired, it is only us who knows best on what we need to do to take care of ourselves. The best way to take care of our bodies is again through our minds. Using our minds to decide what our bodies are telling us from the feelings it provides is a good commencement. It is now required that mental health professionals get medical backgrounds of their clients before they begin working together. When people are mentally ill, they may be subject to allowing their bodies control their minds. I am protesting with much support that our minds are the ones in control and we can change exteriorization by balancing our inner workings (feeling verse thought.) In caring for our whole selves (let's use the body mind spirit trinity) this will keep our currency flowing. In the following chapter I will outline details on different contributions that can influence our health –because "eating" food and exercising are not the only fuels we need.

Chapter VI

Fertilize

I hope I've made it clear that our power's potential is held within our thoughts. Our feelings are also important, but at times we allow them to step too far. When our feelings step into our thoughts and we feel more negative, we can use awareness to change our thoughts. Conjunctionally, finding healthy ways to balance our feelings and thoughts can create a harmonious unity that produces intentional results. If we fail, our realities will exteriorize and reveal such. This chapter will help stabilize our feeling-thought connections by using different types of "fertilizers."

Food

I have heard that a man ate eggs every day and every night. Critics suggest eggs give people "bad" cholesterols –his was fine. I recently found out that eggs actually contain sulfur, which helps take toxins out of our bodies – especially heavy metals (but that's besides my point.) Having been up-and-down about what I should be eating, (in accepting others concepts around controversies) I decided my diet is called "the intuition diet." That means I can use my power and create my reality. I can choose how foods will affect me, based on how I choose to think about them. In knowing every body is different, (in all aspects) we have to be the ones to make our own judgments on how things affect us.

Most earnestly, if you feel you should eat something that your logic is rejecting, try it and measure the results. If when I eat Ramon noodles, I get a headache, I may decide to eat differently. Contrary, someone else eating Ramon noodles could get tremendous energy but may dismiss that result based on factual science. You never know what your body needs unless you listen to the subtle cues –you have got to figure out what is right for you (regardless of what everybody says; no matter what authority they have – authority is an illusion.) Like when I talked about our individuality, we all have different elements to us depending on our paths in life. Food charts can help us track what foods support us best. You can eat normally and track snack and meal substances and (depending on how long your body takes to digest the type of food) try tracking an hour later how you feel (your mood and energy.) Experiencing with foods that leave out certain ingredients can help to fine tune this process. Using my, My Magic Workbook collection, you can find graphs I set up for tracking that can be beneficial. (you can find theses at http://realmagicintro.wix.com/mymagicworkbook)

Imagination

I was riding on the bus one day and to my surprise a young boy was being transported. Including the bus driver, only the three of us were on the bus. The young boy reminded me how special and real our imaginations are. He kept eating imaginary ice creams and was throwing the bus driver some. The driver would catch the ice cream, pretend to eat it and tell the boy he was going to get sick from eating so much ice cream! The young boy even made up fruit punch as his ice cream flavor. This reminded me of a time when I was a young girl. My girlfriend and I held our ice creams up to this black metal wall ornament of a woman and pretended she made our ice cream taste extra special.

My experience and memories emphasize how powerful our imagination is and what an effective tool we have. No matter what, we can always have everything we want in our imagination; real magic starts there! So if your driving a "beat-up" car or even on foot, hold your head high with the confidence and feeling you would have, if you are in your dream transportation. When I am on foot, I have found myself resentful of people driving by, rushing me to cross the street, or having me stop at red lights. In my head I would say things like, "You'll get there before me," or, "Why are you looking at me crazy, this is my only option." Thinking about my reactions now, leads me to become aware of my ego focus and remember I do have the power to make changes in my life by using my creative imagination! I can pretend I am driving when I stop at red lights or rush across the street –like it is a simple as pushing the gas to speed up. This is a simple, yet effective technique to use for any dream as long as you can make it feel real!

As I've mentioned, our feelings are key; and a useful tool to help "screw in" our feelings, is definitely our imagination. With that said, be creative! Try using other sensory to enhance your vision and feeling. Many supports suggest using imagery, creating collages and using your face in them. In the car instance, you could go to a textile store and ask for a swatch or more of fabric that is how you want your interior to feel/look and glue it in places you hands touch, or eyes look when you are in your car –or out of your car. A car freshener spray can give you the feeling of "new" and magazine clippings or Internet print offs can help you focus.

Visualization

There are so many ways to use visualization. Of course we can do visualization meditations, and as mentioned earlier, make collages. Visualization meditations are available online or you could record one to follow in your mind. To clarify, you could write about your dreams or just something peaceful and then record it so you can relax and use your "inner" eyes. When visualizing its important to think about what your goal is. Some ideas include, visualizing to achieve/receive in your present, to relax and let go or even to enhance clairvoyance. Once choosing a purpose, let your imagination take you away in its limitless possibilities.

One of my friends Mischa Schuler (a skilled herbalist) introduced me to meditating with plants. She says each plant has a sprit and you have to go to the "underworld" to meet with them. Using this approach, she gains insight from plant spirits to assist in making her herbal medicine. Mischa emphasizes traveling with a "protective plant." Whenever practicing spiritual endeavors it's a good idea to find a spirit guide and you can find meditations to help you meet one of yours!

Affirmations

Louise Hay says, "An affirmation is really anything we say or think." Affirmations mixed with visualization and true feelings can create real magic. After practice, things happen quicker than before! I noted earlier that it is important to pay attention to our inner dialogs and begin changing the negative statements we make. As uncomfortable as it may feel at first, this discomfort is the only barrier to begin taking control of "the thinker" in your mind. When you show your mind whose boss, you boost your confidence and it is apparent on your outer levels. When we have this pride, we become more susceptible to opportunities and actively responsible for our realities.

When forming positive affirmations, it is coherent to be direct and simple. Most effectively, phrasing statements in the present is constructive. To elaborate, words ending in i-n-g can equate. Exceedingly, dismissing words like not, keep declarations balanced and perceived correctly. An archetype exhibits, "I am fear free," in substitution of, "I am not scared." "I don't want to go to work," can translate to, "I am working at a place I enjoy." If you have specifics, use them. Alongside these guidelines, allowing flexibility by freeing yourself of a specified outcome is substantial. So that's the tricky part, being specific, yet trusting in the best outcome and listening to the guidance along the way.

There are different ways to activate affirmations and like most things, we learn best with repetition. The first step I took with positive affirmations was listening to Louise Hay's recordings. It is said that our subconscious minds are best receptive while our active minds are at rest. This happens when we go to sleep. Scientifically, our DNA regenerates fully every thirty days. In tying these facts together, listening to positive affirmations when going to sleep for a month is an excellent starting point.

When you are ready, writing affirmations geared individually, (specialized just for you) helps empower your connection to them. For me, I generated my written affirmations by making a list of everything I didn't like about myself and/or my life and phrasing them positively. Reciting them in the morning while our active minds are still waking up, gives room for enhanced receptability. Remember the seven to one ratio of a positive thought to a negative one? It can be strategic to focus on a few positive affirmations at a time and repeatedly write them over and over on a sheet of paper.

When we use writing as a tool for positive affirmations, it aids to look at our accounts constructively. When I have used the repetitious writing method, I found that I transformed my original affirmation by advancing it to a concise and direct expression that better identified my position. Whenever we are writing, we are also thinking these testimonies. If we say them alongside, we embellish their intensity and operative nature. Furthermost, the conclusive tetralty combines visualization to the trio. This tetralty is using writing, saying, thinking and feeling. Lastly, Louise recommends using a mirror. Mirrors are defiantly magnifying, hence looking in one creates two of you! Just think, now your tetralty is multiplied to an octalty! The last affirmation tip I recommend is using sticky notes or taping affirmations up where you may need them. For instance, near the mirror when you get ready in the morning, in your car or (as I've done before) using affirmations like, "I love to clean," and, "Cleaning is easy for me," where you keep your vacuum and/or cleaning supplies. As mentioned in the Imagination section, really feel these statements when you see them (it may take practice.)

Meditation

I mentioned earlier that we could use our daily tasks as a form of meditation. In addition to that, there are infinite amounts of ways to make meditation beneficial for you. Like most things I highlight, it is up to you to have the dedication and drive to find what ways will work best for you –or create them! Lichi Lee says that meditation is the respiration of the brain!

Divine Mother used a meditation that focuses on feeling the tension in your body. When you feel a block, smash the energy; break it in your mind. After everything is shattered completely, she suggests sending a gold liquid honey light though the top of your head and just soothing your whole body.

I also like the idea of just being aware and giving your body attention. Attention equals love. Going into many details and relaxing each place feels extremely regenerating. I am talking about starting from each individual toenail, though all your organs, teeth, brain and skull. Every detail of you needs love and attention to feel appreciated and do its best job.

Mantak Chia mentions using a smiling technique in his book Awaken Healing Energy Through The Tao. To feel the energy of your smile and send it down your body thanking each cell for their work. He starts this meditation with nine taps of the teeth (top and bottom together) in nine sequences. I use this as an early morning meditation. Upon waking up, I stretch from my sit bones and attempt to touch my toes with a straight back; most times I bend my knees a bit to get what feels like a good stretch for me. Then, I hold the stretch for nine seconds in nine sequences. Mantak says to massage the gums with your tongue until you feel lost of fresh saliva built up. Pausing for a sacred moment to feel a smile illuminate my face, I bask in that energy. When the energy is pure and truly felt, I swallow the smile down, feeling the energy touch different segments of my body and thanking those cells with love.

A meditation teacher Brenda I. Paquette says, "Use stressful situations to remind you to relax."

Relaxation

I can say relaxation is a form of meditation in itself, but its importance ranks high so it deserved its own section. The consistent ritual I exercise is at least a weekly, relaxing tub. I have been doing this since high school. In those days I was so serious about relaxation, I literally insisted on not lifting a finger on my "special day." My tubs lasted around three hours and if you can believe it, one of my relaxation days landed on the day I graduated high school –so I was not happy about this. There was a gathering at my grand mother's house afterwards that my mom set up and I laid on her couch the whole time! It's definitely a tradition that I have adopted for myself to dedicate time and space for relaxation and meditation.

Recently, by chance, I attended a seaweed festival in Portland, Maine. At the title, I thought it was going to be pretty lame. During my attendance, I quickly realized that this is a new age movement (if I may define it as such.) Turns out, seaweed has all types of benefits to our bodies and the earth! I learned that at the rate of our food consumption and the depletion of nutrients in our soils. Biologists forecast agriculture to be severed by 2070. They say that many thyroid diseases stem from low levels in iodine and table salt is the only source for our iodine. However, it is reported that seaweed is the savior "ocean vegetable" that can solve all our problems. It is theorized that seaweed accommodates all of our minerals and iodine is included. They are using seaweed in soils to replenish them and are fighting to make a stance with the burden of government regulations who seem to be so rooted in tradition, that new age ideals are often outlawed. Along with our soils, implementing seaweed in our diets is also a mission. Finding different, easy ways to add seaweed to our diets is in the works. Naturopathic practitioners and everyday people have found that different types seaweed are better for distinctive health issues and report amazing cures that include shingles and acne. My reasoning for adding this info into my relaxation section is because I have began to add seaweed into my tubs and have found it beneficial. To find out more on the benefits of seaweed and hear directly from seaweed activists visit theseaweedcoucil.org.

There are relaxation meditations you can research online but in addition, it is helpful to be mindful of when you feel overwhelmed. Even just sitting and doing nothing wherever convenient is a form of relaxation.

Stones and Crystals

Ever since I was a young girl, getting a crystal was sacred and energizing. Though my adult years, my beliefs have been criticized and at one point I did not use my stones for maybe a year! I have found using stones and crystals can be like using your imagination or factual. Like most things I talk about, it is "mind over matter." Even so, scientifically, there are earth elements and minerals that doctors using in medication. Holding the mineral can still interact with your body when it is touching your skin. In this way, it is subtle enough that it can make a difference without the negative effects drugs can have. One of the best ways I use my crystals is to put them into my long, relaxing tubs!

Crystals can be like pets or children if you care for them. Like crystal balls, you can actually breathe life into them. It is almost like an empty vessel in which you program and protect. You can find out much more about crystals when you work with them including how to charge them and clear them. When I was younger, my mom used to put hers in a crystal bowl three days before the full moon with sea salt and water.

Oracle Cards

Oracle cards can help you when you are figuring out how to follow your inner voice. These should be used as guidance and not to become dependent on. They can also give you ideas to prepare you for what is ahead along with fuel to help understand your past and present. This is another spiritual tool my mother introduced me to. I found magic in her deck of cards and wanted to pick cards all the time!

Nature

The most ancient, vital energy can be found in nature. Since before humans created time, the sun would help us measure moments to aid in our accomplishments. It was not that our ancestors had more free time, it was the meditative state nature holds and the fact we had a lot more nature in those days. Our ancestors were mainly surrounded in nature all the time. They would probably die from stress and fear if they were suddenly emerged to our present. Back then, no one had to think about relaxing because ultimately, the nature surrounding them would rejuvenate their souls when they finished their daily tasks and sat in the type of silence that existed then. Now we have to work hard to find that bliss and with our enormous population, we may only get solace for a few moments. However, with the expansions and high energy around us, we actually need a lot more than we think.

One way to get in touch with more nature "hort therapy." Getting people to garden transfers negative ions from the soil helping to ground us once again. Create time to spend in nature, for that is where our species evolved from. The impact the natural world can have, won't be understood until we track it. As Socrates referred, "the unexamined life is not worth living." Let's "wake up" together!

Action

Making decisions is a vital part of "steering our wheel" in life. Shakti Gawain said that the part of ourselves that take action stems from our masculinity and our femininity aspect is that passive voice that gives us the ideas. Working harmoniously, (balance is always key) we have got to do physical work to assist our visions. I have portrayed many resources to get started with this are in my past passages. Making a bold title above, conveys its reiterance. The last step after preparation is making measureable actions toward your desires.

Chapter VII

Conclusion

One law of nature suggests that, when we force something to happen, it actually doesn't. The symbolism that illustrates in my mind was inserted from a cartoon I witnessed as a child. There was a child waking with its coat on and the angry controlling wind said, "I'll get this kid to take off its jacket!" The harder the wind blew, the tighter the child held on it its coat. Eventually the wind became very exhausted and tired, and while it was catching its breath, the sun came out. The sun shined happily and effortlessly and the child began to sweat and took its jacket off.

Many teachers provide the technique of letting go of your desired outcome in order to free up the tense energy surrounding it. In another regard, it can be thought that maybe your desire is not the best outcome for everyone involved and being open to the guidance moving you in other directions could be considered. Sometimes surrendering in this way shows the universe or universal energy that you are ready to receive your aspiration.

Fear

Think about relationships; when we "hang on" to someone, it arises from a fear-based energy. Unconsciously, our fear is "ruling the show." In fact, fear wins every time because we allow it to. We work with fear by trying harder to have situations evolve in our favor. Letting go of control is one of the hardest things for some people to do. Using mindfulness, we can find that we strive to control from fear. Surrendering to the present moment can help us dissolve false fear that comes from past programming or future unknowns. This leads me back to the ability to trust in divine order and allow your "thoughts" to flow out your mind's backdoor.

Lissa Rankin, MD illustrates a "cultivating courage" strategy in her book The Fear Cure. She suggests writing a letter to fear and then a responding letter from our higher self. This reminds me of how Louise Hay teaches us to heal ourselves. She says everyone has an inner child who is afraid and many of us are not nice to this child. Many times when we hear our worries and fears, we may try to tell the voice to shut up in different ways. As suggested by these teachers, the best antidote is to be loving toward the fear or inner child by acknowledging the fear. Talking back from a divine parent-like energy can assure this worrying part of ourselves that just because things happened one way in the past, taking a new approach will keep us safe.

The biggest idea here is that you are doing the best you can do and you may have the need to continue in your current circumstances until you arrive at new understandings. We were born into this world with many characteristics of our personality that can only smooth over with time. These distinct details create the feelings inside of us that support our learning. The decisions we make are our nature and we are never doing wrong when we follow what's inside of us that makes us do what we do. Every action we make creates the perfect experience for us to develop the way we agreed to before arriving in our human form. Elaborating that being human was our choice.

The Fine Line

In differentiating between truth and lies and reality between reality conducting, an understanding must arise. This "fine line," or potential contradicting element needs careful attention to be in accordance with actualization. Cultivating the capacity to discern how we adhere to our inclinations is a fundamental degree. The spectrum to consider suggests a scale of fear and trust. Trust should not be confused with pride. Pride can be a lie and also developed from fear. The ideal approach is meditating on the currency associated with a wish and feel-out if it is over-stimulated in any way. Trust is a calm energy where fear is unsettled. Anxiety can derive from excitement or worry. In either case, this currency is energetically hyped and to classify trust, we are looking for a peaceful currency.

Love, trust and respect are the ingredients for success in real magic. Understanding these elements and using them with you first is the only way to develop a safe and stable foundation.

"Don't think of me as your sister, friend or just a little girl. In fact, exclude me all together. Every situation and word compilation is spiritual. Look deeper; higher realms are always speaking"

Dictionary

Here is a Basic Guide to understanding my new words:

1. "ability"- Usual words ending with "ability" define as the ability of the given word.

2. "ful"- Usual words ending with "ful" have the same meaning as the word when seen in an English dictionary –except with the "ful" ending, it means "full of" the root word. For example, "impactful" means full of impact.

3. "ic"- Usual words ending with in "ic" have the same meaning as the word when seen in an English dictionary. However, for grammar purposes, I chose "ic" to replace "-like." This helps simplify and is similar to using apostrophes when adding two words together to make one (don't means do not.) In other words, the meaning of these words holds the root words definition, and the "ic" ending means the word holds the characteristics of that meaning. For example, "rebelic" means rebel-like.

Invented Words Used In This Book:

Rainbowed (rain•bowed) – bands of color in the sequence of a rainbow

Reiterance (re•it•er• ance) – nature of repetition to make strong

Octalty (awk•tell•tee) – eight components that make up a whole.

Tetralty (tet•rale•tee) – four components that make up a whole.
